these sisters both wear old tennis shoes on red feet decaying from bad circulation or bad wine and their dresses are always the same one sister wears a black hat but they hold out and hold out and talk of when the Blvd. was lined with houses more elegant than their own and of the hardwood floors in their house still being in good condition

I see

before the A-bomb hits Los Angeles there will be war, much fighting and so many hurt that flying in the air will be a slow moving blimp-like hospital and helicopters will bring the wounded to this flying aid-station quickly from the battlefield and this hospital marked with a large red cross will be flying over the city when the A-bomb hits and explodes billowing its deadly barrel of smoke upward only the lucky leaving their possessions might flee fast enough to save themselves when these lazy

days of laying
and loving and talking with you are over
I'll remember
the way you
tilted your head
when you teased me
the way you said

"let's take five" the curl of your hair the padding of your hands the beautiful curve of your mouth and the long hours of making gentle love our bodies locked I'll remember you bringing me coffee in bed among the books and papers then coming to bed wet a steaming red lobster after a too hot bath the way you could make me laugh of knowing your face and body so well and sleeping so close turning as one this and so much more I will remember the days passing too fast and how we lavishly used hours and days and weeks just being together

WHERE DO WE GET ALL THESE BURDENS?

Well, you go to the House of Burdens and you say I'll take that one, and that one, and that one, and that one because they all look good to you; and then the Burden Salesman says, Okay ... they're yours ...

and you have to put them all on your shoulders and try to carry them all in one load because you were greedy and they are unreturnable.
