

Entirely as expected? What the voting data tells us about Corbyn's re-election

ISF blogs.lse.ac.uk/politicsandpolicy/labour-2016-voting-data/

9/26/2016

When Jeremy Corbyn was elected Labour leader in 2015, the result astonished many; his re-election surprised no-one. Analysing the 2016 voting data, Peter Dorey and Andrew Denham find a few surprises amidst the details.

In Labour's 2015 leadership contest, a major question had been how a rank outsider and perceived political maverick, like Jeremy Corbyn, could possibly be elected leader of a Party in which he enjoyed very little support among its MPs, and in which he had never held even the most junior Ministerial office. In the 2016 leadership contest, the main question was no longer whether or how Corbyn could win, but by what margin.

In the event, Corbyn's won another strong victory (Table 1), which also shows that he enjoyed a clear lead among all three categories. His total support increased slightly, up from 59.5 to 61.8 per cent.

Table 1: Labour leadership election result 2016

	Jeremy Corbyn		Owen Smith
	Votes	% share	Votes	% share
Labour Party members	168,216	59	116,960	41
Labour Party affiliates	60,075	60	39,670	40
Registered supporters	84,918	70	36,599	30
Total votes received	313,209	61.8	193,229	38.2

However, these figures belie some subtle changes in the scale and sources of Corbyn's support since 2015, as revealed by Table 2.

Table 2: Changes in Corbyn's support compared to 2015, by voter category

	2015		2016
	Votes	% share	Votes	% share
Labour Party members	121,751	49.6	168,216	59
Labour Party affiliates	41,217	57.6	60,075	60
Registered supporters	88,449	83.8	84,918	70

Corbyn's support increased both among fully-paid up Labour Party members, and those who belong to affiliated organisations (most notably trade unions), but declined among 'registered supporters', from nearly 84 per cent in 2015 to 70 per cent a year later. Yet the diminution of Corbyn's support among this previously crucial category of voter reflects the fact that many of those who were 'registered supporters' in 2015 subsequently became fully-paid up members of the Labour Party, doubtless inspired to join precisely because of Corbyn's 2015 election.

It is also likely that a further impetus for some Corbynites to join as fully paid Party members was the July 2016 announcement that the 'registered supporter' fee – entitling subscribers to vote in Labour leadership elections – would be raised to £25 (from £3). Given that Labour's standard membership fee is £47 per year, it is likely that many erstwhile or would-be 'registered supporters' decided to pay an additional £22 to upgrade to full-membership, particularly as this fee can be paid on a monthly basis. Thus did the number of fully-paid up Labour Party members increase from 245,520 in summer 2015 to 338,000 a year later.

Even closer perusal of the 2016 result gleans some interesting similarities to the voting patterns of 2015, but also some surprising differences, in the support enjoyed by Corbyn among Labour Party members, as is apparent in Table 3.

Table 3: Social profile of Corbyn's support among Party members (% of each category voting for Corbyn).

When joined Labour			Age				Gender		Region
Pre-2015 General election	During 2015 leadership campaign	After Corbyn became leader	18-24	25-39	40-59	60+	Men	Women	London	Southern England	Midlands/Wales	Northern England	Scotland
37	74	83	45	63	62	55	53	64	53	59	61	64	40

Source: YouGov 'Exit' poll, 21-23 September 2016.

This shows the extent to which Corbyn's support continued to be drawn heavily from more recent and younger Party members. Certainly, as in 2015, the more recently someone had joined the Labour Party, the more likely they were to vote for Corbyn: 83 per cent of those who had joined the Labour Party after Corbyn's 2015 win voted for him in 2016, compared to only 37 per cent of those who had been full members before the 2015 general election.

As was also the case in 2015, Corbyn's support in the 2016 leadership contest was rather stronger (62.5 per cent average) among those in their 30s, 40s and 50s, but falling back to 55 per cent among those aged 60+. One surprise, however, is that Corbyn's support among the 18-24 age cohort in the Party was 10 points lower than Owen Smith's (45-55 per cent), which rather undermines the common assumption that Corbyn was strongly attracting the youth vote. This might have been partly attributable to Smith's call for a second referendum on Britain's membership of the EU, with younger voters having been strong supporters of 'Remain', whereas Corbyn was widely viewed as lukewarm.

It is also notable that Corbyn's support among Labour Party members in London was not as high as that which he attracted in the Midlands, the North of England and Wales. True, 53 per cent of London Party members voted for Corbyn, but this was clearly lower than his 64 per cent support among members in the North. Such figures suggest that we should treat with great caution the common assumption that Corbyn's bedrock support derives from London's cosmopolitan middle-class urban Left, the Camdenistas and Islingtonites tucking into organic nut-roast and quaffing Fair Trade Merlot, rather than from other parts of England where Labour urgently needs to regain support, particularly among working class voters. The biggest 'defeat' for Corbyn was in Scotland, where only 40 per cent of members voted for him.

It is, perhaps, significant that both London and Scotland were also strong supporters of 'Remain' in the recent EU referendum, and this might have curbed some support for Corbyn in these two areas. Meanwhile, Corbyn again proved notably popular among Labour's female members, with 64 per cent of them supporting him in 2016, compared to 53 per cent of the Party's men.

The headline figures therefore suggest that Jeremy Corbyn secured an emphatic and entirely predictable victory in the Labour Party's 2016 leadership contest. In terms of the overall vote, his victory was indeed decisive, and slightly higher than in 2015. However, more careful analysis of some of the voting data reveals a more nuanced pattern, with Labour's youngest Party members, and those living in London, somewhat less emphatically Corbynite than has been assumed, and with a majority of Scottish Labour Party members preferring Owen Smith.

Yet these caveats notwithstanding, Corbyn's overall victory means that the Labour Party continues to be led by someone whose popularity among the extra-parliamentary membership is very much higher than it is among the Party's MPs, many of whom will now be contemplating whether to stay in the PLP and continue opposing Corbyn, or leave and form a new political party – just as Labour's 'social democrats' did in March 1981, following a decisive shift to the Left: fight or flight. The odds on the latter must surely have shortened considerably since Corbyn's re-election?

About the Authors

Peter Dorey is Professor of British Politics at Cardiff University. For a full list of publications see here.

Andrew Denham is Reader in Government at Nottingham University. For a full list of publications see here.

Featured image credit: Steve Eason CC BY-NC-SA