Naughty Eyes

Don M. Cornwell

Please look at me again with naughty eyes
That hint of mischief known from other years
When hazel hues would twinkle in coy tears
And every glance you gave told tiny lies.
Look at me then look away. Disguise
The glint and change the hint to timid fears
And coquette modesty, so it appears
You never really meant to compromise.
I watched excitement leave your eyes, replaced
By dignity, when surely both were made
As parts of harmony. I've learned to know
Most beauty comes, the lurid and the chaste,
From sparks that eyes control; for faces fade
And gather lines, but age eyes never show.
