Literature, materiality, technology:

Australian literary journals on the edge

Imogen Smith, PhD candidate Queensland University of Technology

A 'work as assemblage': 'a cluster of related texts that quote, comment upon, amplify, and otherwise intermediate one another' (Hayles, 2005)

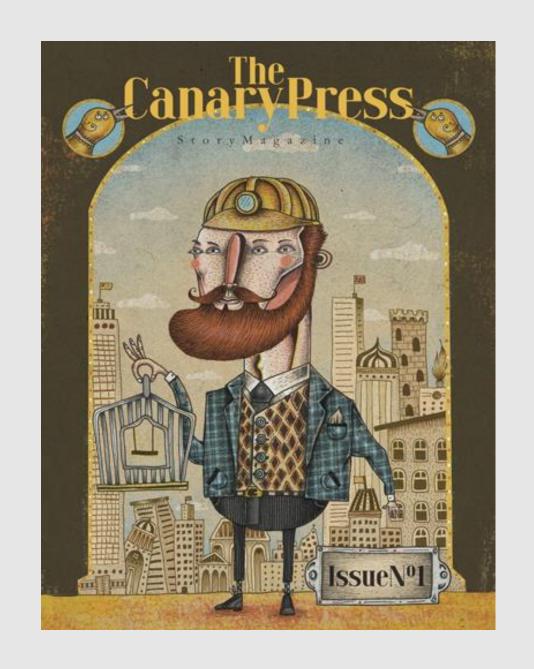

The text itself is called into question, and 'the specificities of media' become 'essential to understanding its morphing configurations' (Hayles, 2005).

Research questions:

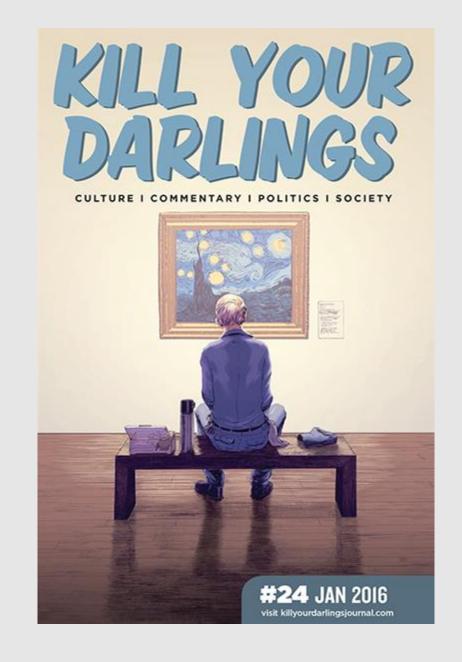

How do print and digital work together within the literary journal as a 'work as assemblage'?

What is the role of print, and is this changing?

Literary journals:

A small periodical in print, on the web, or across multiple platforms that publishes a miscellany of writing forms from both Australian and international writers. This material generally includes short fiction, essays, creative non-fiction, reviews, poetry, and interviews, and can include multimedia content such as podcasts and recordings.

Semi-structured interviews:

11 journals, 9 editors3 print-only,5 'multi-platform',3 web-only

Representative sample ranging across spectrum of Australian literary journals.

Participating editors and journals

Journal	Editor	Publication medium
Cordite	Kent MacCarter	Online
Going Down Swinging	Geoff Lemon	Multi-platform
HEAT	Ivor Indyk	Print (folded)
Island	Matthew Lamb	Print
Overland	Jacinda Woodhead	Multi-platform
Review of Australian Fiction	Matthew Lamb	Online
Southerly	David Brooks	Multi-platform
Stilts	Bronte Coates	Multi-platform
Sydney Review of Books	Ivor Indyk	Online
The Canary Press	Robert Skinner	Print
The Lifted Brow	Sam Cooney	Multi-platform

Surprising findings

- Assumed that online publication would suit journals' nature as miscellanies, reach more readers, and solve some financial problems
- While print and digital worked together, valued differently
- Choice of digital vs print has drawn attention to or enhanced some of the qualities of print
- A hidden dialogic of value?

Economics of print and digital publishing:

- Print a more 'workable business model'
- Difficult to sell immaterial digital content
- People 'expect internet to be free'
- 'Why would you bother buying access to a digital edition of a magazine, when you don't even really understand what it is?'
- Is something definitive lost online?

Materiality and literary value

- Benjamin's 'aura' of the original work of art in mechanical age could be transposed to the analogue work in digital age
- New material literacy of print, where books are art objects and are treated as such
- Print, paradoxically, most popular with younger editors
- Different forms suited to different media, with fiction best suited to print
- Material qualities of a text influence readers' mood and engagement.

Further research

- Literary journals as cultural archive – how to best conserve this in different media?
- Editors a skewed sample?
- Who do literary journals serve and how does this affect media choice?
- Funding how to assess journals' success, serve writers and readers, maintain quality and independence?
