

How close are you to burn out?

A recent study of over 1300 social workers found that over 73% suffered from emotional exhaustion and 26 % from depersonalisation – the process of becoming emotionally hardened.

Introducing 'Simple Pleasures'

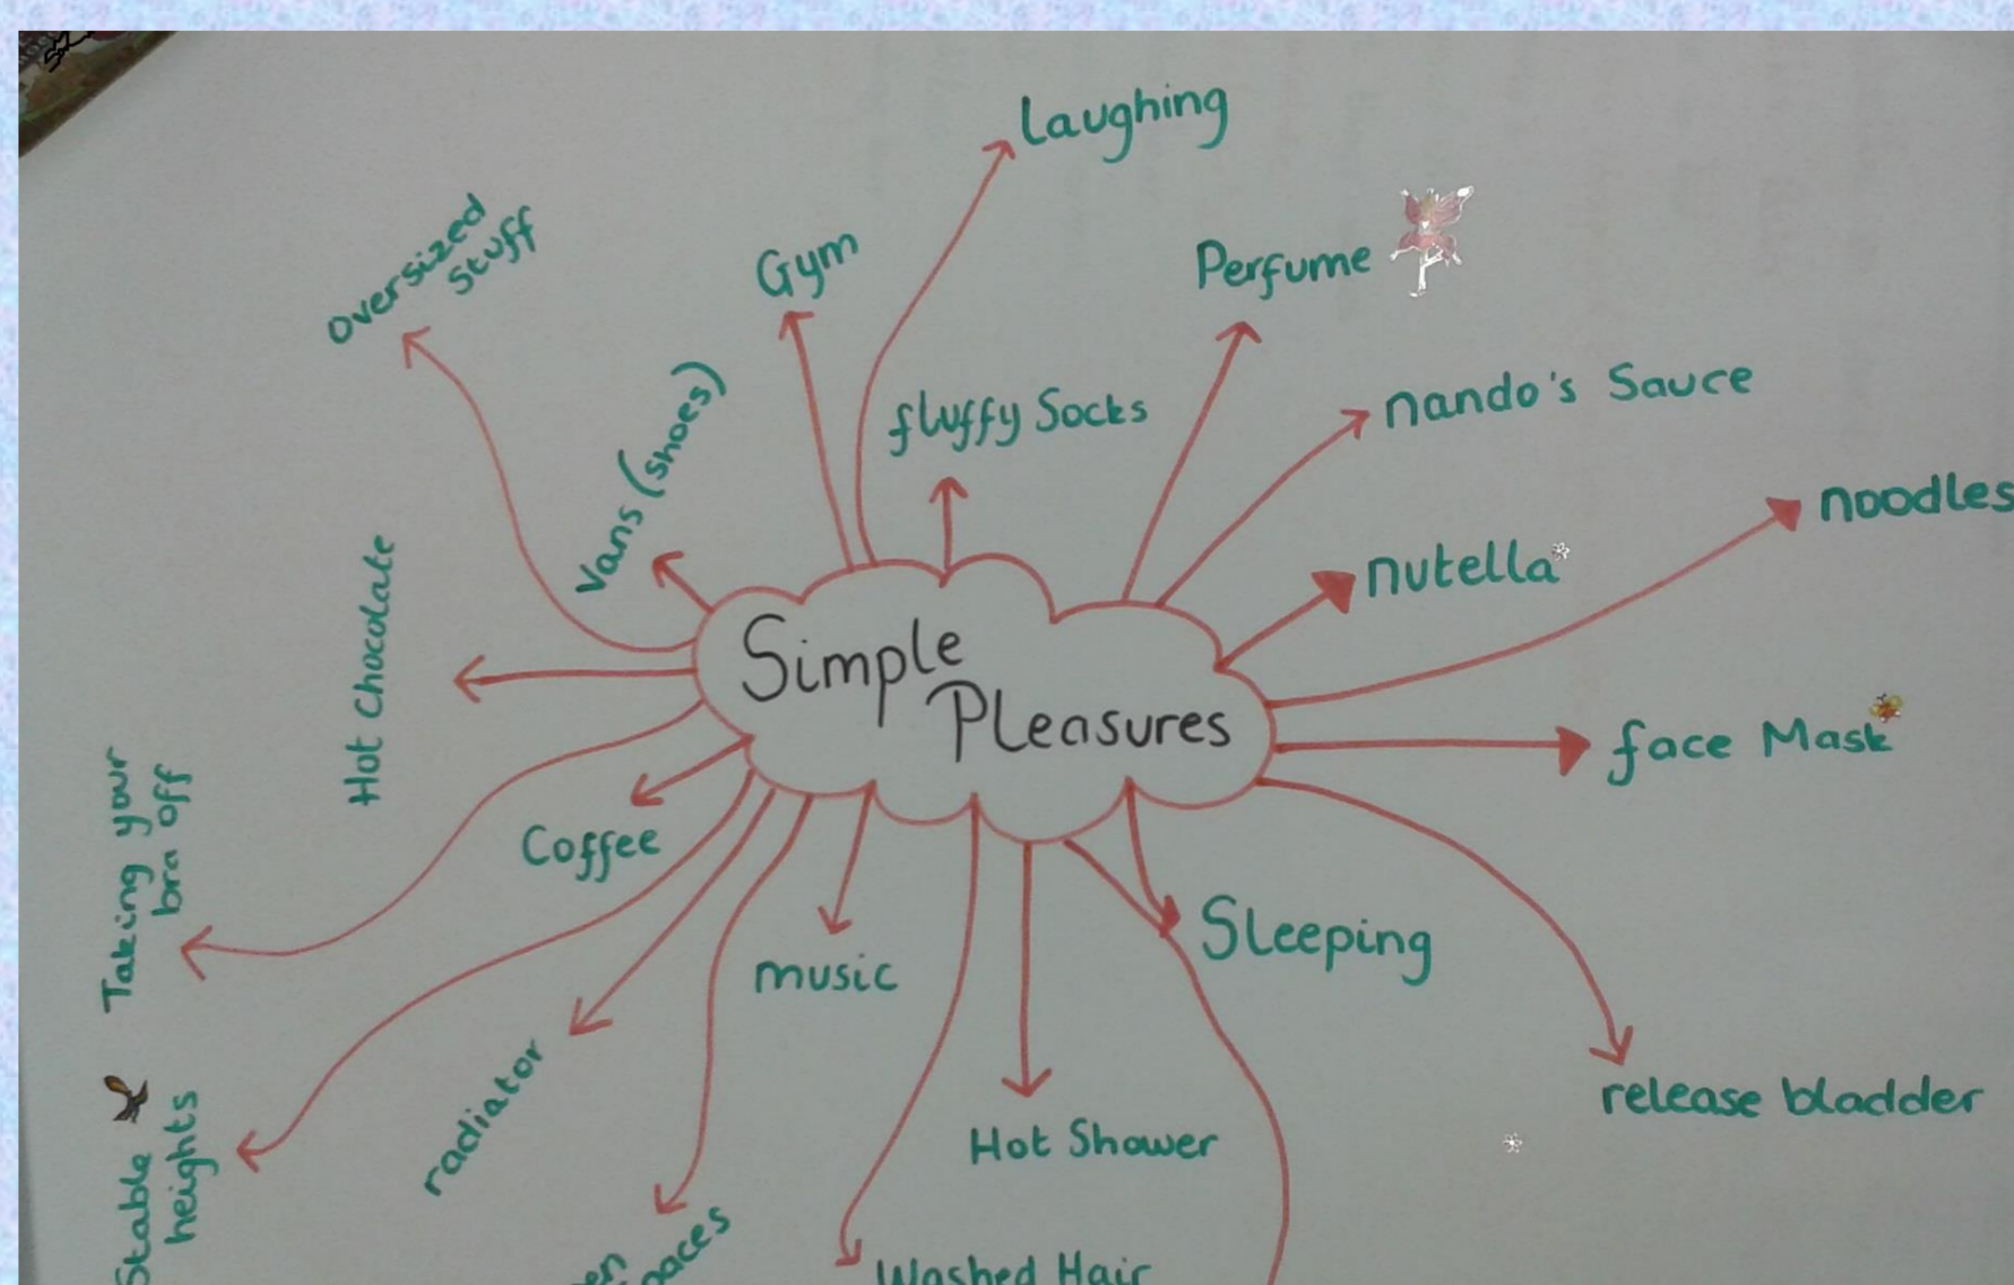

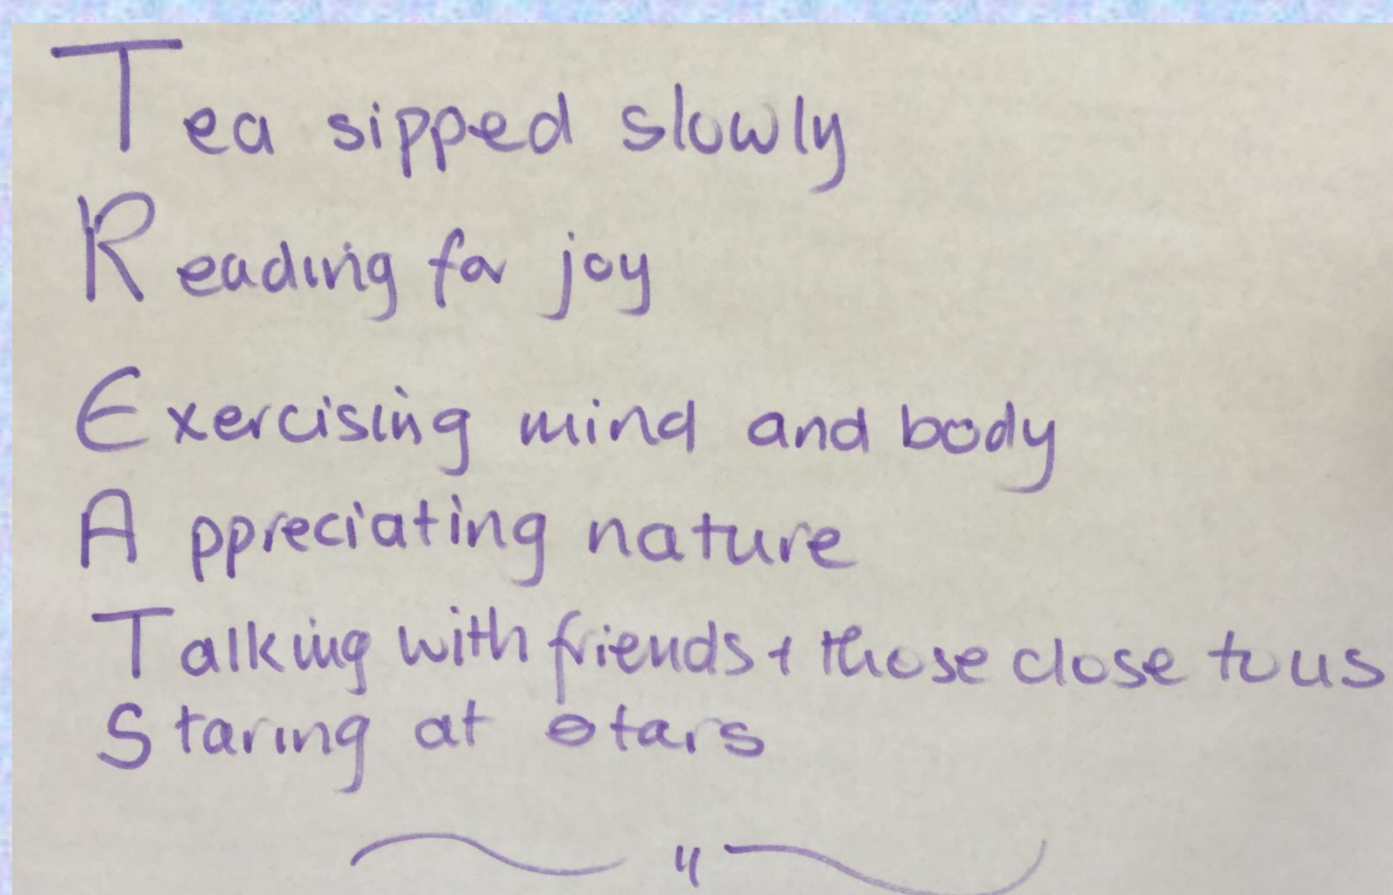

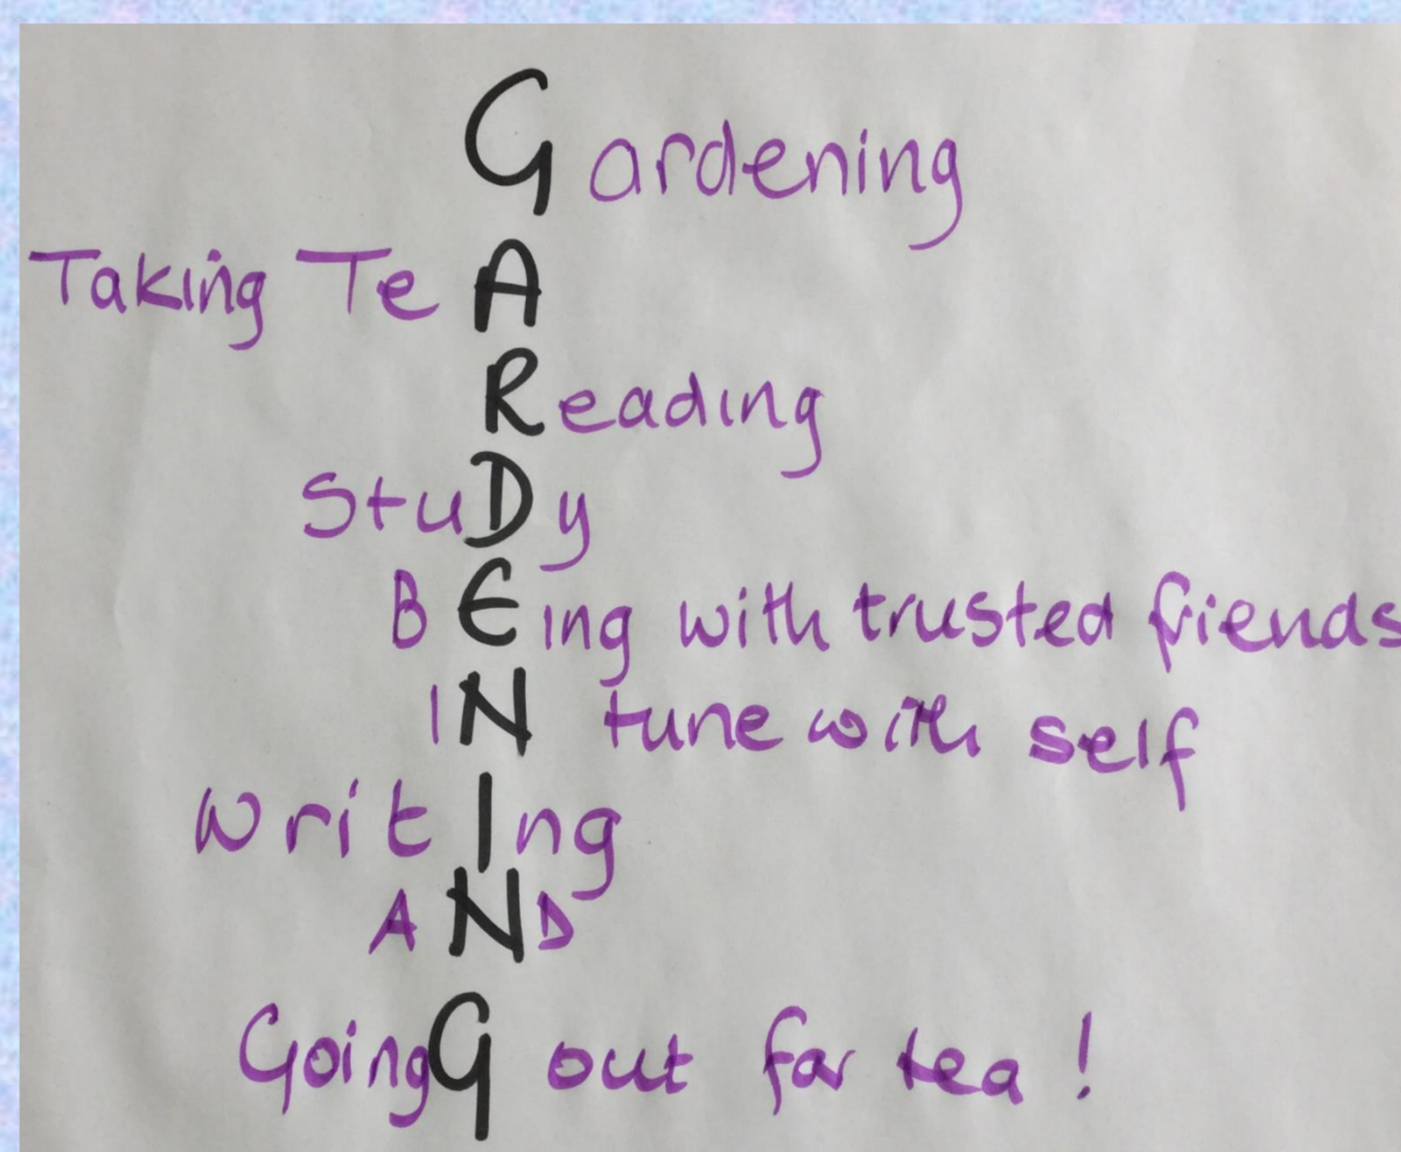

A potent tool (from Transformative Life Writing™*) that may help maintain your sense of resilience & well-being

What are they?

Small things, that don't cost very much, but that give you tremendous joy or satisfaction. Used mindfully, especially in stressful times, they can 'pep' you up, & help you remain grounded.

Here are some examples from our students.
Can you spot a few of your favourites?

At work: what 'simple pleasures' do you sprinkle throughout the day, to maintain your sense of well-being?

We asked our agency partners & colleagues what helps them get through stressful times at work. Can you guess who said what? What works for you?

A laugh shared with colleagues or family

Going for a 10 minute walk

Stopping for a cup of tea. Having time to think before carrying on

Colleagues who are kind & supportive

A continually stressful job is a great motivator to take stock and re-consider career options

Laughing with colleagues – the repetitive jokes we share keep me going through a long day

Even a few minutes away from a stressful task can give me a new perspective on it.

Helping children develop resilience...

How can we help prepare children for the complex non-stop rush of their adult lives? The good news is that where ever we are in our resilience journey, we can learn strategies to get better at 'bouncing back'.
