A Treasure From Lake Michigan

You always said I'd find my niche in life Now from my perspective I guess I have The feel of damp weeds clutched in my hands and razor-sharp Horsetails break apart at their designated places.

The driftwood and sand remind me of plastic army men battling in their own little Hell.
It is here, a stone's throw from Lake Michigan,
where I am grasping for life, yet content to let go.
I imagine myself to be one of the many animals
I saw dead or dying over the years I had spent hiking this area.
I too will be eaten by the scavenger carnivores First the larger four-legged ones, next the web-footed gulls and lastly the amputated maggots, gorging themselves on everything but my bones.

My bones will lie like magnificent sculptures stranded on windblown sand dune pedestals.
Some little boy, like me years ago, will find one and take it home, hoping it is part of an old Indian or maybe even a dinosaur.

I might sit on a window sill of an allowing mother or perhaps on a shelf in a bedroom.
Regardless, I would finally be a treasure from Lake Michigan — like pieces of old ships, weathered bricks embossed with names,
fishing lures, bottles (occasionally with notes)
aluminum floats from gill nets and anything else of priceless worth.

Finally, I reach the state of being I've been longing for
I am a treasure from Lake Michigan.
