Abstract	A two-dimensional photonic band gap structure is proposed for surface temperature reading of objects. Optical properties of GaAs are utilized in the design and simulation of the device since GaAs is nearly transparent and lossless in the chosen infrared region, and also has a reasonably high dielectric constant of 11.4. The structure consists of a triangular lattice of air holes etched into a GaAs slab, with a lattice constant, a, of 0.352 μm, including one linear waveguide and three isolated point defects with radii 0.51a, 0.54a, and 0.57a, respectively. The operational principle of the device is based on guiding and vertically filtering out three pre-selected specifically tuned wavelengths through the corresponding point defects. It is shown that having processed the intensities of these wavelengths, obtained from each defect, in accordance with the blackbody radiation characteristics and the transmission properties of the device, the temperature reading of the target in concern is obtained.

Summary: Abstract: In Koças and Kiyak (2006) we fail to benefit from an already existing solution to the asymmetric firm pricing model as presented in Baye et al. (1992). In their work, Baye et al. (1992) provide a characterization of the equilibria in an oligopoly when uninformed customers do not allocate themselves equally across firms and when reservation prices across firms are homogenous. The characterization of the equilibria when reservation prices across firms are homogenous (propositions 1 through 4 in Koças and Kiyak, 2006) is a substantial component of the theoretical part of our paper and hence we recognize the precedence of Baye et al. (1992) in presenting this characterization. We present an analysis of markets with many asymmetrically positioned retailers that compete for the business of both informed and uninformed customers for a homogenous good, such as software, music, book or a brand-name appliance. We show that two forms of asymmetry, one related to loyal segment sizes of retailers and one related to the positioning of firms, completely explain the observed price dispersion in such markets and the multitude of asymmetrical strategies adopted by retailers. The stochastic dominance of empirical mixed strategy measures is used to test the theory with data on 968 books from 10 online retailers.

Keywords: Price comparison shopping; Price competition; Oligopoly; Internet economics.

System requirements: World Wide Web browser software.

Kontratlar ise kamu kurumları tarafından sağlanmaktadır ve endüstriyel Ar-GE aktivitelerini kapsamaktadır.
