On March 10th, my ten-year-old son, Peter Collins, disappeared. And a six-month investigation led to a boy being brought to Los Angeles from DeKalb, Illinois. They told me and all of you that this boy was my son. He was not my son. The LPPD made a mistake, and that is the reason for the supposed transformation. I have letters from his friends and his grandparents all confirming that he is not my son. I'm having them reprinted now, and I'll have them for you tomorrow. I have given the LAPD every opportunity to admit their mistake and renew the search for my husband. Since they have agreed to do so, it has forced me to bring my case private. And I hope that this now will persuade them to finish what they started and bring my son home to me. Thank you very much.

WRITING ACTIVITY 2

Writing a closing statement

- ❖ Imagine you are a lawyer in case against the Vicksburg Firearms Company. Choose whether you want to be a defense or a plaintiff lawyer. You should write a closing statement for this complicated trial (in case you have chose the attorney for the plaintiff, your closing statement should be different from that you heard in the film).

Follow the tips on writing a closing statement given below.

Closing statement is a summary of the trial told in a way that twists everything that was done through out the trial. You are to take all statements and turn them in your favor before the jury so that you can convince them that you are correct and the other party is incorrect.

Step 1: Reestablish your theme and theory. Start with a story again, returning to the theme that was introduced during the opening statement.

Step 2: Review your evidence. Remind the jury of the facts you promised to prove to them, and take them step by step through the facts of the case as your side sees them. Include expert testimony, witness testimony and physical evidence that support your theory. Point to the promises that have been fulfilled and the ideas proven from the opening statement.

Step 3: Attack the opposition's case. Use this opportunity to point out discrepancies in the other side's theory. Highlight inconsistencies to discredit anything the other side tried to prove or defend.

Step 4: Conclude with emotion. Once you have finished reviewing the story as your side sees it, appeal to the emotions of the jury. Make your final statements memorable, so they have your words in their minds as they begin to deliberate. End the argument on a strong and notable message.

ORAL ACTIVITY 2

A Mock Trial

Work in pairs. One of the students acts as a counsel, the other acts as his/her assistant. You are to represent the closing statement that you've written in the writing activity 3 in front of the jury (you may invite students of other group to be your jurors). The jury will choose the best closing statement of a counsel for the plaintiff and for the defense.

Remember, closing argument is your final chance to sway jurors. This is the last time you'll be able to address the jurors and show them why your client deserves to win. Be presentable. Dress well, keep a conversational tone, and make sure you come across as trustworthy and authoritative as possible.
