Abstract:
The Core Socialist Values have become a defining characteristic of the Xi Jinping era. Under the umbrella of the Chinese Dream discourse, the Core Socialist Values represent a distillation and crystallization of the Xi administration’s vision for Chinese state-society-citizen relations. While using many terms found in western liberal political discourse, such as freedom, democracy, equality and rule of law, the CCP use of these terms is markedly different.

This article seeks to deconstruct the Core Socialist Values and to understand how each of the twelve values is defined, independently and in relation to other components. The article also explores, using a Gramscian analytical framework focused on the “integral state”, how consensus to the state’s proscribed values is not undermined by competing discourses. Through an emergent Chinese “integral state” consideration is given to how civil society becomes the ground for building consensus, reinforced by coercive strategies emanating from the Chinese state. In conclusion, the paper argues that the Core Socialist Values represent a shift in focus under the Xi administration to emphasize the superstructure over the economic base, with the objective of creating citizens of and for the People’s Republic of China.

The Core Socialist Values have become a defining characteristic of the Xi Jinping era. Under the umbrella of the Chinese Dream discourse, the Core Socialist Values represent a distillation and crystallization of the Xi administration’s vision for Chinese state-society-citizen relations. While using many terms found in western liberal political discourse, such as freedom, democracy, equality and rule of law, the CCP’s use of these terms is markedly different.

This article seeks to deconstruct the Core Socialist Values and to understand how each of the twelve values is defined, independently and in relation to other components. The article also explores, using a Gramscian analytical concepts, how a Chinese “integral state” is being prepared to ensure that consensus to the state’s proscribed values is not undermined by competing discourses. Through an emergent Chinese “integral state” consideration is given to how civil society becomes the ground for building consensus, reinforced by coercive strategies emanating from the Chinese state. In conclusion, the paper argues that the Core Socialist Values represent a shift in focus under the Xi administration to emphasize the superstructure over the economic base, with the objective of creating citizens of and for the People’s Republic of China.

The Core Socialist Values of the Chinese Dream: Towards a Chinese Integral State

‘Citizens’ is the term for the people who collectively own the nation.
A nation is the accumulation of its people’s achievements, without whom there would be no nation.
Liang Qichao, 1899

The Xi Jinping era began with cautious optimism for many China observers, yet has given way to concerns that Xi’s policies constitute a volte-face on social and political progress which, in the most ardent criticisms, constitute a regression to the Mao era. Alongside clearly repressive actions against activists and a sweeping anti-corruption campaign, new policy initiatives seek to re-emphasize the leading role of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) across both the repressive and ideological state apparatus. This includes directives instructing the state media to serve the CCP; tighter regulation of the funding and registration of domestic and international non-governmental organizations (NGOs); the reiteration of CCP supremacy over the legal system; the strengthening of political education in the compulsory and higher education sectors, and intimidation, persecution and prosecution of various activists, lawyers and campaigners under charges of sedition and subversion. That these developments constitute evidence of the reassertion of illiberal politics cannot be disputed: these are the strategies of an authoritarian state. However, authoritarianism is not always solely characterized by coercion, and alongside such strategies there is clear evidence that the CCP is, through its propaganda infrastructure, pushing a range of consensus building activities under the umbrella of the Chinese Dream discourse. Most prominent amongst these is the Core Socialist Values campaign, which lays out the CCP’s vision through four goals at each of the national, societal and citizenship level.

The core approach of this article is to examine and interrogate the Core Socialist Values in order to understand how the CCP is expanding its appeal to resonate with the people over whom it wishes to exert its dominance. It is, first and foremost, a study of consensus building initiatives originating with the CCP and targeted at Chinese citizens, though it must be acknowledged that these activities constitute one side of a state-building project, complemented with a range of policies and responses which are aimed at negating and suppressing opposition to the state vision. Several concepts developed by Antonio Gramsci are introduced to illuminate these consensus building efforts, and to frame an exploration of the relationship between such efforts and the coercive and repressive activities also clearly evident.

The article adopts a critical approach which has, at its heart, an objective of understanding the trajectory of development in contemporary China. It begins by laying out the Gramscian concepts of hegemony, the integral state and common sense utilized in the analysis, along with discussion of these concepts in relation to contemporary China. It then proceeds to provide an account of the Core Socialist Values, drawing on CCP leader speeches, CCP theoretical publications and an analysis of several hundred propaganda posters published under the Chinese Dream propaganda campaigns⁸, further dissecting the national, societal and citizenship dimensions of the Core Socialists Values. Throughout this analysis, in addition to primary source materials, extensive reference is made to secondary literature. These secondary sources are drawn from across the fields of China Studies, Politics, Sociology, Law Studies and Chinese Philosophy. While a Gramscian lens is applied throughout, the concepts of hegemony, the integral state and common sense are reintroduced explicitly in the conclusion to offer a critical account of the Core Socialist Values, not merely as a rhetorical propaganda campaign, but as the centerpiece of a hegemonic state-building project focused on state-led reform and guidance of transformation of the superstructure.

Gramsci: Hegemony and the Integral State

Following the defeat of the Italian Communist movement by Mussolini, and his subsequent imprisonment, Gramsci sought to explain a paradoxical aspect of the failure of revolution in advanced capitalist states: why, given the prevalence of capitalist exploitation in the advanced capitalist states of western Europe, did socialist revolution fail to foment and overthrow the ruling elites? Gramsci developed an ‘arsenal of concepts’ which located the durability of these advanced capitalist systems in a fortress of civil society which could survive intact even when the state was weakened by conflict. In employing the thought of Gramsci in analysis of contemporary China, the various concepts developed by Gramsci to survey the strength of advanced capitalist states in the early 20th century are appropriated to explore how the CCP is strengthening its leadership position through a process of consensus building. Gramscian approaches to the analysis of the contemporary Chinese condition can be found across a range of disciplines and research areas: Nigel Todd, Arif Dirlik and Liu Kang have drawn clear parallels between the thought of Gramsci and the revolutionary strategies of Mao; Blecher uses Gramsci to frame explorations of workers’ protests and labour relations during the reform of state-owned enterprises under Jiang Zemin and Zhu Rongji’s policies in the late 1990’s; Zheng Yongnian utilizes a Gramscian framework to cast the CCP as “organizational emperor”; Zhang Xiaoling applies Gramsci’s concept of hegemony to analyses of the Chinese state media sector and communications technology development; Elena Mayer-Clement uses Gramsci to navigate the impact of marketization and commercialization of the film and music industries upon CCP regime stability, and Su Xiaobo develops a Gramscian analytical framework to interrogate the strategic use of ideology and the narratives of revolution and reform to pursue, attain and maintain hegemony in contemporary China. More recently, Li Xing has utilized Gramsci’s concepts of hegemony, counter-hegemony and passive revolution to frame his discussion of the Chinese Dream, while Heidi Yu Huang provides an overview of the reception of Gramsci’s concept of hegemony in China itself.

Gramscian hegemony differs from conventional uses of the term, moving away from simple equations with the military and economic dominance of one class over another to focus on the consensus between the ruling elite and wider society. Hegemony, in the Gramscian sense, is conceived as “consensus armored by coercion”. Consensus, for Gramsci, extends beyond a simple equation with persuasion to refer to the participatory aspect of consensus. It is how people act, not necessarily how they think, which Gramsci emphasizes as the basis of consent and dissent. The parameters of consensus are initially determined by the state vision, in this case the Core Socialist Values, with negotiation over those parameters being the primary function of hegemonic activity. It is in this regard that Hobsbawm identifies Gramsci’s greatest contribution: his development of a Marxist theory of politics.

While domination can be achieved through simple coercive means, via the judiciary, legislature, military, paramilitary and other formal institutional structures, Gramscian hegemony is a form of domination reliant primarily on the negotiation of consent and active participation of citizens through civil society, which includes organizations as diverse as schools, universities, guilds, chambers of commerce, media outlets, non-governmental organizations, pressure groups, trade unions, churches and other religious organizations. Gramsci’s view of civil society stands in stark contrast to the term’s general use in common academic and journalistic contexts which characterize civil society more broadly, much as Charles Taylor proposed: “a web of autonomous associations independent of the state, which binds citizens together in matters of common concern and by their existence of actions could have an effect on public policy”. As Alagappa argues, such definitions reify civil society as a normative ideal, containing within it “the potential to liberate citizens from the oppressive state and to confer full economic and political freedom on them”.

In contrast to definitions offered by Taylor and Alagappa, Gramsci’s civil society combines with political society to form what he calls the integral state. With regards to hegemony, the integral state constitutes the arena in which hegemony is maintained, via coercive methods actualized through the formal institutions of political society, and via consensus, which is contested and negotiated through civil society. This dual characteristic can also be expressed as the ruling elite’s ability to exercise leadership through consensus building with allied social groups, while antagonistic social groups are the subject of coercive strategies aimed at pre-empting, negating or punishing challenges to the ruling elite. For Gramsci, force and consent are inseparable elements of hegemonic dominance. As Gramsci explains: “the (integral) state is the entire complex of practical and theoretical activities with which the ruling class not only justifies and maintains its dominance, but manages to win the active consent of those over whom it rules”\(^{25}\). This view challenges definitions which reify civil society as a domain of free association and expression where the state is subject to challenge from non-state actors. Instead civil society is conceived of by Gramsci as an arena of ideational contest in which the subaltern groups negotiate the terms of their continued domination by the ruling elite. Hegemony exists when there is large scale consensus to the values, dispositions and beliefs of the ruling elite. It is for this reason that the Core Socialist Values are analyzed as the potential basis for a Chinese integral state.

From Philosophy to ‘Common Sense’

Crucial to the process of negotiating consensus is Gramsci’s differentiation between ‘good sense’, which Gramsci compares to coherent philosophy, and ‘common sense’, which “enters the consciousness of the masses as part of their confounded and fragmentary”\(^{26}\) world view. Where a coherent philosophy or set of values is devised and disseminated by a ruling elite, such as the Core Socialist Values, Gramsci argues that “the document of its historical effectiveness”\(^{27}\) lies not in the complete and unconditional acquiescence or brainwashing of those over whom the ruling elite wish to exert dominance, but that such efforts “leave behind a sedimentation of ‘common sense’”\(^{28}\). It is this ‘common sense’, shared in and across groups which prepares the terrain and enhances the possibility of hegemony: “Common sense is the folklore of philosophy, and is always half-way between folklore properly speaking and the philosophy, science and economics of the specialists. Common sense creates the folklore of the future, that is as a relatively rigid phase of popular knowledge at a given place and time.” Put simply, ‘common sense’ is a canon of knowledge that frames our understanding of society; that is shared intersubjectively across disparate communities, social groups and the general population, and which exists at such a depth that the mere possibility of questioning it does not occur.

Common sense, understood in this way, constitutes the genetic building blocks of cultural power. While many may view CCP propaganda as nothing more than rhetoric, the sincerity, or lack thereof, of the communications between the Chinese state and its citizens does not necessarily diminish their transformative potential. Rather, rhetoric is a key strategic weapon in the reproduction and transformation of common sense over time and crucial to the mobilization of common sense in service of the interests of the state. The extent to which a ruling elite is successful in having their values absorbed into common sense, the greater likelihood that common sense will come to reflect those values and contribute to consensus building between the state and its citizens. As Fontana observes, the distinction between knowledge and opinion breaks down in hegemonic contexts, with hegemony encapsulating a “dual and reciprocal movement – the passage from knowledge to opinion and from opinion to knowledge”.

While Gramsci conceived of the concepts of hegemony, the integral state and common sense to reveal the durability of advanced capitalism, and simultaneously to explain the failure of socialist revolution, these concepts offer a framework for the analysis of the Core Socialist Values as one aspect of state-building under the Xi administration. Through approaching the Core Socialist Values from a Gramscian perspective, they take on a potentially transformative power which demands further enquiry. With Gramsci’s concepts in mind, we will now turn to an interrogation of the Core Socialist Values.

Core Socialist Values

Since the ascension of Xi Jinping to the CCP leadership at the 18th Party Congress in November 2012, a major publicity campaign has been undertaken to disseminate Core Socialist Values. Core Socialist Value propaganda is most visible through the Parallels are drawn between Gramsci’s common sense and Plato’s doxa, which refers to opinion given by rhetorical speech. blanket coverage of poster art and digitized forms of propaganda posters. These are developed and disseminated through the CCP publicity infrastructure under the CCP Propaganda Department (CCPPD) and the Central Guiding Committee for Building Spiritual Civilization (CGCBSC) at the various administrative levels: national, provincial, municipal, district and community. In addition, the publicity offices of state media and publishing houses also appear in more prominent, large-scale and widespread, propaganda displays. At all administrative levels, these posters are labeled as public information advertisements under a national campaign called “Stressing Civilization, Building a New Culture”. All publicity materials are also collated and publicized online through wenming.cn, a website jointly administered by the CCPPD and the CGCBSC.

This campaign, a component of the Xi administration’s hallmark political discourse of the Chinese Dream, has been rolled out across all state media platforms, including television, newspapers, radio, billboards, posters and, increasingly, via social media platforms including Sina Weibo and Tencent WeChat. Television commercials appear on China’s national broadcaster, CCTV, and on provincial television channels. Even a popular children’s cartoon, Big Head Son and Little Head Dad, broadcast on CCTV, has been utilized as a method of dissemination. The high visibility campaign is virtually inescapable. The aesthetics and artwork of propaganda posters draw on traditional arts and crafts produced by Chinese artists, including sculpture from

The imagery and tone of the political messages is both striking, in artistic terms, and subtle, in the communication of apparently apolitical traditional Chinese values. The campaign lays out a vision for the dialectical relationship between nation, society and the citizen and constitutes a crystallization of the CCP’s values which stand in contrast to western liberal values. Furthermore, it eschews the indoctrination of Marxist dogma, which is largely absent in terms of slogans and aesthetics, in favour of aligning notions of citizenship with Confucian ethical concepts including filial piety, self-cultivation and the morally superior person.

Core Socialist Values: Reforming the Superstructure

The primary emphasis throughout the post-reform era has been to promote strategies to transform the economic base, but the Xi administration’s reforms and policy campaigns place a greater weighting on transformation of the superstructure. This indicates a concern amongst the current CCP leadership regarding the ethical, moral and ideological transformation of Chinese society. Alongside economic performance, national rejuvenation and competent governance, this emphasis on values relates to social stability as one of the constitutive elements of the CCP’s “performance legitimacy”37 which it promotes as the irrefutable evidence of its suitability for continued governance. This emphasis on ethics and morality is revealed in political speeches including several given by Xi Jinping:

“We need to energetically foster and promote core socialist values; promptly establish a value system that fully reflects Chinese

37 Zhu. 2011.
characteristics, our national identity, and the features of the times; and strive to occupy the leading position on this issue. Ethical values play a very important role among core values. Without morals, a country cannot thrive, and its people cannot stand upright. Whether or not a nation or an individual has a strong sense of identity largely depends on their morals. If our people cannot uphold the moral values that have been formed and developed on our own soil, and instead indiscriminately and blindly parrot Western moral values, then it will be necessary to genuinely question whether we will lose our independent ethos as a country and a people. Without this independent ethos, our political, intellectual, cultural and institutional independence will have the rug pulled out from under it.”

Xi Jinping

Third Plenary Session of the 18th CPC Central Committee, February 17, 2014

In an article published by Qiushi, the theoretical journal of the CCP, Liu Qibao asserted that “where a nation and country are concerned, the longest lasting and most profound force are the core values commonly recognized by the whole society.”

Prior to the 18th Party Congress, outgoing CCP leaders, including General Party Secretary Hu Jintao and NPC Chairman Wu Bangguo, rejected the notion of adopting a “western” political system. However, in a second speech, Xi Jinping acknowledges the strength of values in western liberal democracies and identifies the pervasive effect those values have in framing legal, regulatory and policy initiatives. In doing so, Xi indicates an admiration for the stability conveyed upon western nations by their shared values, pervasive through civil society and guaranteed through their institutionalized status. This continues from and complements Xi’s preceding speech, cited earlier, that China’s values must develop to reflect Chinese characteristics.

tradition and prevailing national conditions with both speeches constituting a rationale for Chinese exceptionalism:

Core socialist values should not only be cultivated and fostered by improving people’s ways of thinking and encouraging good habits, but should also be guaranteed by institutions and mechanisms. Western countries are very good at this. Even though their governing parties alternate in power every four or five years, their values are stable and consistent. One important reason for this is that the design of their systems, the formulation of their policies, laws and regulations, and their judicial and administrative actions are all governed by their core values.

Xi Jinping\(^{43}\)

Third Plenary Session of the 18th CPC Central Committee, February 24, 2014

The first mention of Core Socialist Values came from Hu Jintao on the 8\(^{th}\) November 2012, in his last duty as General Party Secretary before handing over the reins to Xi Jinping. In his final report delivered at the 18\(^{th}\) Party Congress, Hu proclaimed that the CCP should “promote prosperity, democracy, civility and harmony; uphold freedom, equality, justice and rule of law, and advocate patriotism, dedication, integrity and friendship, so as to cultivate and observe Core Socialist Values”\(^{44}\). These values have since been clearly categorized under three levels: Prosperity, democracy, civility and harmony correspond to the national level; freedom, equality, justice and rule of law constitute societal values, and patriotism, dedication, integrity and geniality are the values associated with citizens.

Liu Yunshan⁴⁵ states that the Core Socialist Values “represent a more concentrated expression, clearly spelling out the values that the state, society, and citizens should aspire to, incline towards, and act by”⁴⁶. These values are substantively impacted by their categorization at the national, societal or citizen level. They must be understood as constitutive elements of hegemonic⁴⁷ projects at the national, societal and citizen levels, not as independent values and goals in and of themselves.

National Core Socialist Values: Prosperity, Democracy, Civility and Harmony

Both prosperity and harmony form a link with the Hu Jintao era, extending the dual objectives associated with Hu Jintao’s Scientific Outlook on Development of establishing a harmonious society and a *moderately prosperous society*⁴⁸. They are joined by two other concepts, democracy and civility, forming four national characteristics which the CCP wishes to characterize the modern Chinese nation by 2049.

⁴⁷ Hegemony is used here in its Gramscian sense, whereby the ruling elite aims to build consensus to its values, dispositions and vision through a process of consensus building via civil society. Hegemonic projects are the deliberate strategies devised within political society and mobilized through civil society to engage the populous in serving the ruling elite’s interests. Gramsci 1992; Hoare and Sperber 2016

Perry considers it “noteworthy” that democracy is ranked after prosperity in importance, yet an alternative interpretation is that these four national values are interdependent: greater than the sum of their constituent parts. Perry also notes that the interpretation of democracy “seeks to elide the fundamental contradiction between Enlightenment values and illiberal politics”, revealing a conceptualization which “refers to something quite different from what American social scientists generally have in mind when we debate the prospects for China’s democratization”. It is a contention which finds confirmation in the statement by Hu Jintao that China “will never copy a Western political system”.

Harmony informs the internal CCP practices guided by the Leninist concept of democratic centralism, allowing for democratic debate, discussion and development of policy within the CCP, but also requiring a united front precluding the possibility of dissenting opinion once policy directions have been decided upon. It is an approach which replaces the competitive aspects of western liberal democracy to emphasize harmony in the political process which is itself, in turn, illustrative of civility.

Experiments with deliberative democracy in China have spawned a focus of scholarly enquiry over the past decade. Tang argues that deliberative democracy is possible in China, even though the political system is resistant to liberal democratic electoral reform, identifying processes whereby discussion of the best method to refine and enact policy is acceptable, but where direct challenges, injurious to the concept of harmony and considered to be uncivilized political contests, are not. These discussions further highlight the dislocation of democratic contests, concerned with the selection of political representatives, from the process of democratic participation which is the defining characteristic of democracy in the Core Socialist Values.

Harmony not only informs understandings of democratic participation, it also relates to the value of civility at the national level. In a speech given at the UNESCO Headquarters on 17th March 2014, Xi Jinping spoke at length about the need to respect different civilizations. There are several implications of this speech: that Chinese civilization is different from others; that parochial or ethnocentric judgments about other cultures are unacceptable, and that civilizations can be viewed as different, but not as superior or inferior. Kallio draws attention to Xi Jinping’s claim that Chinese civilization should be characterized by a capable administration, thriving culture, economic development, stability and a unified people. Civility is often linked to the rejuvenation of the nation, a concept which is itself inextricable from the teleological goals of national prosperity and the moderately prosperous society.

Societal Core Socialist Values: Freedom, Equality, Justice and Rule of Law

The four societal values provide perhaps the most contentious definitions when compared with their common sense meanings in western liberal political discourse. In an article entitled “How to understand ‘freedom’ of the Core Socialist Values”, Xu Nengyi acknowledges the origins of the concept of freedom, beginning with early Enlightenment thinkers in 17th century Europe before providing a contrasting definition of freedom. That freedom is categorized here as a societal value is a distinction within the Core Socialist Values discourse which serves to emphasize the elevation of society above that of the individual. Xu identifies the collective nature of the people’s freedom as distinct from western freedom choosing to emphasize the “great cause of the people’s (collective) freedom to push forwards”. Freedom, then, necessitates the placement of limitations upon personal freedom when it infringes on the rights of society to progress, with the trajectory of that progression delimited by the CCP. Harmony and participatory democracy are reinforced at the societal level through the concept of a people’s freedom, with mass activity within the confines of the CCP vision constituting the contribution of Chinese people in the realization of the Chinese Dream.

Widening income disparity within cities; between urban and rural populations, and between coastal and inland provinces, represents a major challenge in light of the stated Two Centenary Goals. Feng notes that equality will be measured by two key indicators relating to the first centenary goal to be achieved by 2021: the equalization of access to public services and the narrowing of income disparity and the wealth gap. Equality is framed in terms of society: rather than being an objective to ensure the equality between individuals, it approaches equality as an objective that should be pursued through policy initiative. Kongshøj discusses initiatives aimed at increasing coverage of the welfare state, highlighting the impact of decentralized governance in the PRC. Nevertheless, Kongshøj argues that local experiments have come in response to stated national objectives of integrating the social insurance schemes of urban and rural hukou holders, and that “as so often seen before in Chinese history, local experiments often point to future national-level policies”.

Interpretations of justice and rule of law reinforce the underlying logic of freedom of society over freedom of the individual, and the maintenance of social order. Xi Jinping has highlighted that upholding justice has a role to play in conferring legitimacy upon the CCP, making a commitment in February 2013 to “make every effort to ensure that people feel that justice is served in every court case”. This pledge for justice must, however, be understood in relation to socialist rule of law which is at odds with western conceptions of rule of law. Socialist rule of law was written into the constitution of the People’s Republic of China in 1999, with Article 5 of the Constitution amended to state that the “People’s Republic of China governs the country according to the law and establishes the nation under socialist rule of law”. In Chinese legal discourse, rule of law is contrasted with rule of man, yet there is also a distinction between interpretations of rule of law. The term rule of law is an abbreviated term in Chinese which can refer to both socialist rule of law and western conceptions of rule of law. This is often expressed in English language scholarship on Chinese law as the distinction between “rule of law” and “rule by law”. Orts provides a discussion of these concepts as they relate to China’s legal development, and argues that both are essential in understanding the trajectory of China’s legal reform in the post reform era. Orts also offers distinctions between the two differing conceptual relationships between the law and the state. According to Orts, “Rule of Law”, the concept most clearly associated with legal systems in western liberal systems, constitutes:

“a normative and political theory of the relationship (between) legal institutions and the political state that includes, but is not limited to, a theory of limited government through some form of constitutional separation between the judiciary and other state powers”.

Conversely, the concept of “rule by law” that is most often associated with the law in China refers to:

“the use of legal rules in order to assure the uniformity and regularity of an existing legal system, regardless of its more general political or moral properties. In this sense, even a grossly authoritarian legal system may qualify as ruling by law.”

The Core Socialist Values, however, refer to a societal value of rule of law, not “rule by law”, requiring a further examination of the Chinese terms. With regards to socialist rule of law, the term yīfǎzhīguó reveals the objective to establish “a nation ruled according to the law” which can be more associated more closely with Orts’ definition of “rule by law”. This differs from a similar term, yǐfǎzhīguó, more closely associated with western conceptions of rule of law, which advocates “a nation ruled by means of the law” and which reflects Orts’ definition of “rule of law”.

Consequently, the CCP’s claims to embrace and promote the “rule of law” are often dismissed as rhetoric, yet such claims ignore this distinction between yīfǎzhīguó and yǐfǎzhīguó.

The Fourth Plenum of the 18th Party Congress became the first CCP Central Committee Plenary Session on the Rule of Law, resulting in a document entitled “Some Major Questions in Comprehensively Advancing Governing the Country According to Rule of Law”\textsuperscript{70}. Peerenboom documents both the optimism of some legal scholars ahead of the Fourth Plenum and the abject pessimism of many critics whose position is committed to the notion that “Socialist Rule of Law is an oxymoron”\textsuperscript{71}. Peerenboom acknowledges that the Fourth Plenum resulted in a definition of Socialist Rule of Law that is “normatively…an emphatic rejection of the globally dominant liberal democratic conception of rule of law”\textsuperscript{72}. Socialist Rule of Law is a mechanism for serving the teleological modernization projects constitutive of the Chinese Dream, a fact which categorizes Socialist Rule of Law as a form of “rule by law”. Critics claim that Socialist Rule of Law places the CCP above the law, yet this is a defining and intentional characteristic of Socialist Rule of Law. However, while the CCP itself remains above the law, the ongoing anti-corruption campaign increasingly provides CCP members with little protection from the full force of the law\textsuperscript{73}, though any officials subject to legal prosecution are first expelled from the CCP\textsuperscript{74}. Defining Socialist Rule of Law in service of the CCP’s political projects repositions the emphasis of justice: not justice for individuals and the protection of rights, but justice for social order which, in turn, provides freedom for the progression of society and the benefit of all people.

\textbf{Citizen : Patriotism, Dedication, Integrity and Friendship}

The Core Socialist Values propaganda campaign conceptualizes the citizen as subordinate to the nation and society, yet also defines citizenship as constitutive of and crucial to the realization of the Chinese Dream at the national and social levels. In this regard, the CCP vision for the citizen in contemporary China is that of a duty-bound actors: patriotic and dedicated citizens are essential for the realization of national rejuvenation and establishment of a prosperous nation; integrity and geniality help bring about civility and harmony, and democracy is inextricably linked to the willing participation of the citizenry in this process. In the view of the state, a society that is free, equal, fair and administered according to the law requires a citizenry with these qualities.

Citizenship as a Social Relationship with the State
The CCP, in developing the Core Socialist Values, has reduced the citizen to the status of a social actor whose agency is subsumed under their responsibility to contribute to societal and national objectives. This reduction requires analysis in order to understand why it is unlikely to be rejected outright, and why it may resonate with the citizenry, constituting a reasonable framing of state-society-citizen relations in the Chinese context.

The Chinese sociologist Fei Xiaotong’s identification of Chinese culture as a “differential mode of association” is particularly useful in elaborating an explanation of how the CCP are attempting to reify citizenship in terms of its relationship to the CCP’s vision for a modern China. Fei’s model describes a series of concentric circles emanating from a social actor, imbuing it with an “ego-centric” characteristic. However, ego-centrism in Fei’s model is not to be confused with individualism, whereby a person’s identity is independent of social relationships. Henry Rosemont Jr. attributes the centrality of individualism in western political thought to the philosophical arguments of thinkers from Hobbes through to Rawls. However, the notion of the individual likely comes from Judeo-Christian thinking, as beings created in the image of God, and itself informs the development of political documents such as the American Declaration of Independence which appropriates Judeo-Christian notions of the individual: “We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness”. Small wonder that western liberal political and civil society has evolved to espouse this normative perspective so evangelically. In contrast, Fei defines the differential mode of association as a “system of social networks linking people together in multiple ways.

75 This concept is contrasted with the “organizational model of association” which Fei argues characterizes western societies. See Fei 1992, 60-70.
76 Henry Rosemont Jr discusses the absurdity of suggestions that people in western societies are not social beings, but qualifies this by arguing that “our sociality is at best peripheral in modern Western political and moral theory”. See Rosemont Jr 2008, 47.
77 Rosemont Jr 2008.
Fei’s model emphasizes the dynamics of Confucian hierarchies in Chinese social relations; that the self is defined in terms of its relationships with others, necessitating adherence to the culturally-bound codes of etiquette, protocol and convention. These superior-subordinate hierarchies are not systems of total dominance, but convey what Madsen describes as “complementary reciprocity” upon both parties, manifest through mutually reinforcing moral behaviour.\(^{80}\) Crucially, social relations are not based on voluntary association, but on moral obligation. The “ego” at the centre of Fei’s system of concentric circles is not autonomous, but exists only through the moral obligations of the relationships which constitute them as a social being: “there is, in principle, no self outside of roles and relationships”\(^{81}\). Confucian thought asks the question, are we “human beings”? or “human becomings”?\(^{82}\), accentuating the nuanced Confucian perspective that humanity is not an inherent property of people, but an expression between people. As Gao states: “a Chinese male, for example, would view himself as a son, a brother, a husband and a father, but hardly as himself...in essence a person can never separate him or herself from (their) obligations”\(^{83}\). Nosco also highlights this as an identifying feature of Confucian conventions, noting that “Confucianism would reject the notion of a human person as an individual, if by this term one means to suggest the presence of a free and autonomous self”\(^{84}\). The role of the citizen as defined by the Core Socialist Values, and the relationship between citizens and the state, follows the Confucian, relational logic of Fei’s model: citizens are not “born”, but rather they “become” by virtue of their contribution to the teleological modernization project formulated by the CCP. identifying and defining a citizenship characterized by patriotism, dedication, integrity and geniality, the CCP are aiming to exploit socially constructed, common sense understandings of relationships which stem from Confucian thought. Daily interactions in China are projected onto the state-citizen relationship in a manner which makes it seem both mundane and natural.

Dreams and Goals: Strictly, Actually, Comprehensively

While the Chinese Dream is characteristically amorphous, elusive and malleable\(^{85}\), the Core Socialist Values campaign defines specific concepts. In a move which secured consistency with the outgoing administration of Hu Jintao while simultaneously ensuring progression from it, Xi Jinping unveiled Two Centenary Goals which characterize the Chinese Dream. The first, of these centenary goals calls for the achievement of a moderately prosperous society by the centenary celebrations of the founding of the CCP in 2021. It echoes propaganda from the Hu Jintao era and is related specifically to the first national Core Socialist Value: prosperity. The second centenary goal, to be realized by 2049 on the centenary of the founding of the PRC, is the transformation of China into a nation that is characterized by all four national Core Socialist Values: prosperity, democracy, civility and harmony\(^{86}\).

These Two Centenary Goals are clearly reflected in Xi Jinping’s Four-pronged Comprehensive Strategy (hereafter Four Comprehensives), the emergent guiding philosophy of Xi Jinping which is expected to succeed Hu Jintao’s Scientific Outlook on Development. The Four Comprehensives aim to: comprehensively build a moderately prosperous society; comprehensively deepen reform; comprehensively govern the nation according to law, and to comprehensively and strictly govern the Party\(^{87}\).

This final element of the Four Comprehensives emphasizing Party governance has also been prioritized with its own propaganda campaign. The Three Strict, Three Real\(^{88}\) campaign aims to improve Party discipline and cadre conduct, incorporating elements of the Core Socialist Values. Cadres are reminded to strictly cultivate their moral character, strictly exercise power and authority, and be strict with oneself.

These “Three Straits” form the foundation of ethical conduct necessary to realize three “real” objectives: planning, innovation and integrity.

The first element of Three Strict, Three Real campaign encourages cadres to strictly cultivate moral character, evidencing an appropriation of the Confucian status of a morally superior person which, according to Confucian philosophy, is pursued and attained through a process of moral self-cultivation. Similarly, the demand to be strict with oneself constitutes one half of a famous Chinese saying on moral conduct: “be strict with oneself, be lenient/generous to others”.

Citizenship & Confucian Ethics: Tapping into ‘Common Sense’ Understandings

Feng discusses the inter-weaving of Confucian ethical concepts with contemporary CCP propaganda concepts. Discussing the six virtues of Confucian ethics, Feng draws attention to the Confucian philosophical relationship between virtue and conduct. Table 1 shows traditional Confucian ethics: six virtues which can be demonstrated through the conduct of six virtuous actions:

The six virtuous actions do not correspond to specific virtues, rather, Confucian thought adopts an holistic ethos whereby all six virtuous actions contribute to the attainment and demonstration of the six virtues. This interrelationship between virtue and conduct is echoed through the citizen-level Core Socialist Values. A sub-campaign within the Core Socialist Values poster campaign, promoted under the heading Great Virtues Illuminate China, mirrors this connection between virtue and conduct, forming a tacit relationship between the Core Socialist Values and five virtuous actions.

The Great Virtues Illuminate China campaign contains five virtuous actions which borrow from both the six virtues and six virtuous actions associated with Confucian thought, intertwining them with aspects of the Core Socialist Values, rendering them indistinguishable from traditional Confucian values and conduct. Similarly, through drawing on Confucian concepts already absorbed into existing common sense understandings, and aligning new concepts with them, this strategy makes the adoption of Core Socialist Values less prone to rejection as it merges with the existing currents of common sense.

The Confucian ethical concepts of benevolence, righteousness and filial piety all appear in the Great Virtues campaign. Two further values, honesty and respect appear in both the Great Virtues Illuminate China and Core Socialist Values campaigns, though not in the original Confucian six virtues or six virtuous actions. Other Confucian concepts including harmony and friendship feature extensively on Core Socialist Values posters, and to a lesser extent in Great Values Illuminate China posters.

The five virtues of the Great Virtues Illuminate China campaign are further integrated into propaganda messages alongside explicitly Confucian virtues, increasing their appeal to common sense understandings of Confucian ethics. Many propaganda posters from the umbrella Chinese Dream campaign align the Confucian concept of the morally superior person 92 with the role of the citizen referenced in the Core Socialist Values.

Two posters are discussed here: The first poster 93 identifies the three virtues of a morally superior person as benevolence, wisdom and courage. The second poster 94 introduces the Confucian ethic of righteousness stating that a morally superior person embodies righteousness. Of the four virtues contained in the two posters, only benevolence is explicitly connected to both the Confucian six virtues and CCP

92 In Confucian morality and ethics, the ultimate aim of the self-cultivation process, pursued through the six virtuous actions, is to become a morally superior person.

propaganda, appearing as a virtue in the Great Virtues Illuminate China campaign. The remaining terms of wisdom and righteousness are taken directly from the Confucian six virtues, while courage is a Confucian concept that is both dependent upon and constitutive of benevolence and righteousness. Additional propaganda campaigns serve to better illustrate the Core Socialist Values in action, with one prominent campaign, Good People, Everyday, launched in September 2014, providing daily profiles of citizens from all walks of life who embody the values through their social conduct, actively spreading and carrying forward the core socialist values. Profiles include good sons, good employers, good lawyers, good teachers, good cadres, good street cleaners, good doctors, good farmers, and even good guys. A new example of conscientious Chinese citizenship is added to the site daily, while a sister site, the China’s Good People List, allows netizens to vote from a list of approximately 200 citizen candidates each month through a national online and social media campaign. Profiles of citizens include both party members and non-party members, and emphasize their demonstration of Core Socialist Values. Filial piety and acts of magnanimous social contribution feature prominently, as well as dedication and altruism in serving local communities at all levels, with candidates nominated under five categories: Helping People for Happiness; Just Heroism; Honesty and Integrity; Dedication and Devotion, and Filial Love of Kin.

A Chinese Hegemony with a Confucian Common Sense

In making the Confucian turn, the CCP under the Xi administration are expanding their own interests to encompass those of the people they govern and over whom they wish to exert dominance. This constitutes an act of moral and political leadership which seeks to resonate with Chinese citizens, reframing their citizenship as achievable through conduct which reflects aspects of existing intersubjective normative values characteristic of contemporary Chinese society. While the vast majority of Chinese people will not have a deep philosophical or academic understanding of Confucianism, they do, nevertheless, share a broadly accepted, common sense understanding of Confucian values. The Core Socialist Values currently being propagated by the CCP aim to find traction with those established beliefs, values, dispositions and conventions, and seek to encourage conduct which is already viewed as culturally and socially desirable.

However, Gramsci conceives of hegemony as a process by which social forces and movements can be articulated into a set of strategic alliances which ultimately serve the interests of the ruling elite. The Core Socialist Values and the Chinese Dream move beyond the simple reflection of shared beliefs to constitute a state project to usher in a new cultural order which cements the leadership position of the CCP in contemporary China. The CCP under Xi Jinping regards consent to the values which it claims characterize the modern Chinese nation, rather than simple acquiescence in exchange for economic opportunity, as essential in securing long term social stability. Xi makes this explicit in a speech given on an inspection tour following the 18th Party Congress in December 2012:

If our 1.3 billion citizens and 82 million Party members as well as overseas Chinese can achieve consensus, we will constitute a powerful force...We must realize that people from different localities and social strata who have different backgrounds and occupations think differently. We must therefore consider: where can we find consensus? Where can we allow differences to persist?

Xi Jinping99

Therefore the CCP is compelled to align its interests with the broader interests of the Chinese people and differentiated groups; to appeal to them, and to engage in an active process of fostering consensus which, taken in tandem with coercive measures, pursues a distinctly Chinese hegemony. Through such a process, the CCP aims to inculcate Core Socialist Values through encouraging conduct and behaviour which is already broadly interpreted as normatively correct. To the extent that, over time, this is successful, the absorption of these values into Chinese common sense will be realized, forming a relatively durable consensus aimed at conveying a robust stability upon the both the CCP and the PRC. However, this is a process that will likely unfold over the next several decades, well beyond the term limit of Xi Jinping. As Xi himself notes: “Preparatory work must be done. One must not worry about it taking too long, for the work will be accomplished in the fullness of time.” This preparatory work finds its catalyst within the doctrine of the Core Socialist Values, with various other constructive and coercive strategies helping to prepare the ground for Core Socialist Values to flourish, whilst also limiting the potential for alternative to take root.

99 Xi 2014e, 49

Towards a Chinese Integral State
The Chinese Dream, with the Core Socialist Values as its central pillar, represents a shift in focus of the Socialism with Chinese Characteristics project to emphasize the primacy of cultural power over economic development: of the superstructure over the economic base. The Core Socialist Values campaign is accompanied by the increased positive and negative intervention of the state in the institutions and structure of Chinese civil society, including schools, colleges, universities, state media, online media, social media, religious organizations, domestic NGO’s and trade unions. The Core Socialist Values represents the ideological doctrine of the state, with the Xi administration’s aggressive civil society interventions, both constructive and destructive, aimed at providing fertile ground for the negotiation of consensus to that doctrine, and complemented by strategic interventions that negate the potential for alternative discourses to emerge. While civil society is also potentially the site for counter-hegemonic movements to emerge, such is the strategic use of coercive interventions, such as legislation and regulation of civil society organizations, that the potential for discourses alternative to the Chinese Dream to emerge is reduced almost completely. Nevertheless, the limiting of discourse does not itself destroy civil society: rather it demonstrates that the integral state, as the sum of political and civil society, of coercion and consensus, is a useful lens through which to view contemporary China.

Conclusion
The Core Socialist Values are of profound importance in identifying the potential trajectory of political, social and cultural transformation in China over the remainder of Xi’s leadership and beyond. They represent a distillation of the state’s vision for state-society-citizen relations and a crystallization of values the CCP envision as characterizing China in the 21st century. They provide both aspiration, in terms of the national and societal values depicted, and expectation, in relation to the duties conferred upon Chinese citizens. They also contain formulations of normative concepts which challenge and are diametrically opposed to common sense usage of the same terms in western liberal thought, including freedom, democracy, civility and rule of law.

While the overarching intention of the CCP can reasonably be identified as the maintenance of its own dominant position, the Core Socialist Values provide evidence that this dominance and the CCPs particular brand of authoritarianism will be exercised through moral and political leadership as well as through coercive means. While easy to dismiss as a cynical and insincere appropriation of Confucian values, which may or may not be reducible to political rhetoric, the Core Socialist Values, fully backed by the CCP and disseminated through the ideological state apparatus, much of which remains under the purview of the state, retain significant transformative potential. This, of course, depends on the extent to which the CCP is successful in having its values taken up by those over whom it wishes to exert dominance, a fact which alone helps explain the alignment of the CCPs Core Socialist Values with Confucian values.

In considering why the CCP has devised a configuration of national, societal and citizenship values, there are a number of potential factors. Many scholars have argued that the basis of the CCP’s legitimacy rests on their ability to continually deliver significant economic growth. Double-figure GDP growth characteristic of the reform era is unlikely to continue as China enters a new phase of development, with a focus on transitioning from export-led manufacturing to a consumer-driven economy. With a potentially reduced ability to rely on economic growth as a quid pro quo between the Chinese state and its citizens, the Xi administration recognizes the precariousness of a consent built on the provision of economic growth and opportunity, especially in the current global economic climate. It is clear from several speeches by Xi himself that ideological consensus and cohesion around a set of distinct values, dispositions and beliefs is the objective of such efforts. While Xi’s predecessors have, either deliberately or by virtue of their own Chineseness, sought to appeal to and exploit common-sense values, this distillation and crystallization of a clear set of national, societal and citizenship values represents a focused effort on building normative consensus and shared identity in pursuit of promoting cohesion, stability and the consequent strengthening of the CCPs dominant position.
It is essential here to reiterate that consensus should not be equated with persuasion. Citizens in China are presented with a choice: to either resist, in a conscious act of defiance, or to participate, either willingly or otherwise, constituting an act of consent. It is here that the complexity of coercion, delivered through the repressive state apparatus, limits the scope of potential for resistance to the Core Socialist Values. While individuals themselves may be capable of resistance to any inculcation of state values, the same is not true for organizations across commerce, media and civil society whose very existence increasingly depends on compliance with laws and regulations compelling them to operate in accordance with the state vision. This mobilization of legislation to negate the potential for alternative discourses to arise is a central weapon in facilitating the visibility of the Core Socialist Values. Traditional and new media platforms are increasingly unable to tolerate content which is potentially in opposition to the Chinese state’s world view.

This article has sought to analyse of the Core Socialist Values as the ideational centerpiece of a reformation of the contemporary Chinese superstructure. The catalyst for this process is the crystallization of the values of the ruling state into a coherent moral, ethical and ideological vision: a process which is currently unfolding in China with the propagation of the Core Socialist Values through the CCP propaganda machine. The strategic intertwining of Confucian values with those proscribed in the Chinese Dream discourse increases significantly the likelihood that the CCPs values will find traction with Chinese people and, over time, become constitutive of common sense in contemporary China, though this is a long and arduous process dependent not only on the persuasion, but to a great extent on the ability of the authorities to limit alternative, counter-discourses. The Core Socialist Values originate with political society, yet, in order to be developed into a broad consensus, these ideas must be communicated through civil society, defined here as the arena within the integral state where consensus is negotiated.

The Core Socialist Values, as part of a wider grand narrative of the Chinese Dream, address the CCP’s most pressing contemporary concerns of citizenship, morality and identity and how they impact upon the maintenance of the CCPs position of dominance. While the preceding eras of Deng Xiaoping, Jiang Zemin and Hu Jintao have transformed the People’s Republic of China for the 21st century through development policies most clearly emphasizing economic transformation, Xi Jinping’s administration has departed from his post-Mao predecessors to elevate the reform of the superstructure above that of the economy. While his predecessors have established a modern, revitalized People’s Republic of China for the 21st century, the task which befalls Xi Jinping and his administration, and to which these propaganda campaigns are wholly committed, is to create Chinese citizens.
