Caribbean Notes

Paul Farnsworth, Louisiana State University

The Seventeenth International Congress for Caribbean Archaeology was held in Nassau, Bahamas from July 21-26, 1997. Among the papers presented were a number of interest to readers of this newsletter:

"Seaman's Valley and Maroon Material Culture in Jamaica" E. Kofi Agorsah, Black Studies Department, Portland State University

"Isolation and the Development of Bahamian Culture" Paul Farnsworth, Dept. of Geography & Anthropology, Louisiana State University

"African-Caribbean Technology: Forging Cultural Survivals of the Atlantic World" Candice Goucher, Black Studies Department, Portland State University

"Social Repercussions of Slavery as Evident in African-Curacaoan'Kunuku' Houses" and "Archaeological Testing at Fort Oranje, Bonaire" Jay B. Haviser, Archaeological-Anthropological Institute of the Netherlands Antilles

"Evidence of African Continuities in the Material Culture of Clifton Plantation, Bahamas" Laurie A. Wilkie, Department of Anthropology, University of California, Berkeley

A volume containing all the conference papers will be published for distribution at the next Congress in 1999. In the meantime, contact the authors directly for further information about their papers.

A number of recent journal articles have just been published relating to African-American archaeology in the Caribbean. Because of the international nature of Caribbean research, keeping track of relevant publications can be difficult. Authors of publications related to African-American archaeology in the Caribbean are encouraged to send references for their recently published works to the regional editor for inclusion. Those not published in Historical Archaeology include:

Student theses and dissertations are especially difficult to keep track of. Students and/or their advisors are encouraged to send information on recently completed works to the regional editor. The following Caribbean theses of interest have been filed this year:
