Abstract.

This subject of this thesis is Nuzhat al-nazar fī tawdīḥ Nukhbat al-fikar, a manual written by Ibn Ḥajar al-‘Asqalānī (d. 852/1449), outlining the science of prophetic traditions (‘ilm al-hadīth). The thesis aims to fulfill two tasks. Firstly, an accurate and accessible translation of the Nuzhah will be presented in English. Secondly, this will be coupled with a detailed and critical commentary of Ibn Ḥajar’s work. This commentary will assess the worth of the Nuzhah in many ways; the writings of Ibn Ḥajar will be analysed to learn what it said about the climate of the ninth Islamic century, by comparing it with the works of Muslim scholars before and after Ibn Ḥajar. Additionally, where the works of modern, non-Muslim scholars such as Schacht and Juynboll are mentioned, it will be with the purpose to show the interaction with their Muslim counterparts. Themes such as the use of technical terms in the discipline, the importance of seniority and the pedagogical nature of the Nuzhah will also be discussed.

Arabic broken plurals have been translated into English. So, for example, I have written hadiths rather than aḥādīth.
The Nuzhah of Ibn Ḥajar al-‘Asqalānī (d. 852/1449); a translation and critical commentary.

1.1. Introduction to the Thesis.

Nuzhat al-nazar fī tawdīḥ nukhbat al-fikar is one of the most famous and respected manuals in the discipline of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. Written by Ibn Ḥajar al-‘Asqalānī (d. 852 A.H./1449 C.E.)¹, it was one of the last major works on the subject, aimed at consolidating the vast array of literature that preceded it. The work is still revered today and continues to be taught in seminaries throughout the Muslim world.

Nuzhat al-nazar is actually a detailed commentary of a much shorter treatise written by Ibn Ḥajar, Nukhbat al-fikar fī muṣṭalah al-athar. The latter consists of only a few pages. In his introduction to Nuzhat al-nazar, Ibn Ḥajar explains that his contemporaries asked him to offer a brief overview of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. Ibn Ḥajar duly obliged in the form of Nukhbat al-fikar, but he was then later asked to expand on this work. The result was Nuzhat al-nazar fī tawdīḥ nukhbat al-fikar. Though in reality the Nuzhah is two separate works (Nuzhat al-nazar and Nukhbat al-fikar), Ibn Ḥajar wrote his final piece in an amalgamated style.² The result is that it can be read as if it is one piece of work.

As it will be shown in chapter three, the Nuzhah is only a small reflection of Ibn Ḥajar’s knowledge and academic contribution to the discipline of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. He wrote

² What this means is that when Ibn Ḥajar embarked on writing the Nuzhah, he did not delete anything from the Nukhbeh. Rather, he added the commentary in between.
individual treatises on countless areas in this field. But the accessibility of the Nuzhah is just one reason why the work has remained in the public domain for such a long period of time. The work strikes a perfect balance between being a sound appreciation of 'ilm al-ḥadīth, but without deviation and without stretching into volumes of work. It offers an excellent overview of the main terminologies used in the field, a simple and systematic presentation of the division of traditions and an invaluable insight into Ibn Ḥajar’s own methodology. In short, the importance of this work should not be overestimated and this is why an appreciation of it is required.

1.2. The Objectives of the Thesis.

The primary aim of this thesis is:

a. to offer an English translation of the Nuzhah.

b. to couple this with a critical analysis and an evaluation of the work, through the means of an innovative commentary.

1.2.1. The translation.

This work will present an accurate yet easily-accessible English rendition of Nuzhat al-naẓar fī tawdīḥ nukhbāt al-fikar. The actual text of the Nuzhah will be presented in bold font throughout the chapter. In the Nuzhah, I have tried to keep the translation as literal as possible. In places, this is difficult not least because the Nuzhah itself is an amalgamation of two works. Therefore there are places where I have added words in square brackets that are not to be found in the original Nuzhah. This is for the sake of easier reading in English. Additionally I have sometimes added words in round brackets that are usually the translation of certain terminologies that Ibn Ḥajar employs. Admittedly, there are places where the English translation of the Nuzhah does not flow as well as one could hope for, but as much as possible, I wanted the English to resemble the original Arabic. In translation terminology, there is a distinction between dynamic equivalence (which attempts to capture the thought and meaning at the expense of word order and grammatical features) and formal equivalence (which attempts literal fidelity at the expense of readability or even understanding). In practice translation tends to be a mixture of the two, and I think the same could be said for my translation of the Nuzhah. For the translation, I have depended upon the copy published by Mu′assasat Manāhil al-‘Irfān, in Beirut, Lebanon (1990). This version has been edited by Muḥammad ‘Abbās al-Ṣabbāgh.3 1.2.2. The Commentary.

A thesis at this stage of academia needs to display an original contribution to knowledge. Certainly the translation of the Nuzhah into English will fulfil this aim, as this is, to my knowledge, the first time the Nuzhah has been translated in full into English at PhD level.4 But it is in the commentary of the Nuzhah where I hope to display a unique understanding of the discipline, as well as show a degree of independent, critical and analytical skills. I intend to do this with the following points in mind:

3 Unfortunately, I did not come across any information regarding the Nuzhah in original, manuscript form. Informally, I was told that it can be found at the al-Azhar University manuscript archives, in Cairo.

Muslim scholars after Ibn Ḥajar showed their admiration for the Nuzhah by penning detailed commentaries on it, of which several are in circulation today. Many of these works, such as al-Munāwī’s contribution, provided an unreserved and uncompromising explanation running into volumes of work. However, the nature of these existing works on the Nuzhah has followed a routine pattern. For most part, they have commented on the Nuzhah, not necessarily critically assessed and evaluated it. The technical terms in the commentaries have been explained, but the wider implication of them has not been outlined. These works tell us little about the academic and social climate of the ninth Islamic century. Certainly, the likes of al-Qārī and al-Munāwī have not asked what the Nuzhah said about the development of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth as a whole.

This is precisely where I hope to contribute with a fresh input and show true originality. My purpose is not to comment on the Nuzhah for the sake of it. As much as possible and wherever appropriate, I will ask what the writings of Ibn Ḥajar tell us about his era and the nature of ḥadīth academia at the time. If there are areas in the Nuzhah that received more attention – areas such as mutawātir, bid‘a and marfū‘ for example – then the possible reasons behind this will be assessed. Similarly, the emphasis will not be on what a particular technical term means, but more on what purpose it served in the discipline.

The thesis is centred on a work written over five centuries ago. Yet there will be places where I will refer to recent, relevant literature stemming from non-Muslim, Western academics such as Burton (1994), Brown (1999), Goldziher, Guillaume (1924), Juynboll (1983, 1996), Muir (1858) and Schacht (1959). Wherever appropriate, I will compare the writings of Ibn Ḥajar with what non-Muslim academics have had to say. For instance, in the section on riwāyat al-akābir ‘an al-aṣāghir (the narration of the seniors from the juniors), I will compare Ibn Ḥajar’s observations with that of Schacht on ‘family isnāds’. The issue of aṣaḥḥ al-asānīd (in particular, the strength of the isnād Mālik – Nafi’ – Ibn ‘Umar) has been looked at in detail by Schacht (1959), and I will assess this in light of Ibn Ḥajar’s own writings on it. Leites (2000) analysed bid’a in considerable detail, showing how differences in reporter denomination were reflected in ḥadīth transmission. It is important to stress the reason why non-Muslim input will be mentioned in this thesis. It is not to entertain the authenticity debate over ḥadīth literature as such. It is not to answer whether Ibn Ḥajar’s opinion on family isnāds is correct or whether Juynboll’s is. Rather, my purpose is to show how the contrasting camps interact with one another, and what this tells us about Muslim academia. In places, I will show how the input of Westerners has been portrayed by Muslim and frequently, I will suggest that the convergence of views on a particular area is more apparent than one first assumes.

- In order to fulfil the above point, I believe that the methodological approach I intend to adopt for the commentary is pivotal to the quality of the work. My intention is to offer a unique commentary that attempts to show utmost impartiality. The commentary will attempt to neutrally assess the views held on the discipline by Muslim scholars5 on the one hand and non-Muslim scholars on the other. This task will not be easy. To highlight the problem with this task, a brief example of šahīfa will be briefly presented. Collections marking the earliest period of ḥadīth documentation took on the forms of small booklets, called šahīfas. At this stage, reports were simply put together in writing.

5 I accept that the term ‘Muslim scholars’ is a sweeping generalisation. In this thesis, ‘Muslim scholars’ will refer to the mainstream Sunni Muslims who trust the sources of the Qur’ān and Ḥadīth. This therefore excludes the likes of the Ahl al-Qur’ān movement and the Aḥmadis.
Primarily, such works pertain to the Prophet’s lifetime until the second Islamic century (Kamali 2005, 31).

One of the earliest sahifas was ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Amr’s (d. 65/684) al-Ṣādiqa⁶. When assessing the worth of this collection, one cannot fail to ignore the contrasting views from academics. Muslims view this work in a favourable light whereas non-Muslims do not. Al-Ṣāliḥ referred to it as ‘one of the most reliable historical documents...’ (in Kamali 205, 25) whereas Juynboll declared it to be the ‘the fruit of someone’s imagination’ (1996, XI: 173-4). Such contrasting conclusions question the neutrality of both Muslim and non-Muslim academics to the discipline.

This partiality issue is further seen in the language employed in the field. When assessing the work of those who share a similar viewpoint, the tone is one of appreciation and respect. When the Muslims analyse the works of non-Muslims – and vice-versa – the temper and approach is dismissive and sometimes insulting. So Burton talks of ‘Goldziher’s magnificent insight’ (1994, xvii) and Schacht of his ‘brilliant investigations’ (1994, xx). Al-Sibā‘ī, on the other hand, describes Goldziher as ‘the most dangerous of the Orientalists, the one with the longest hand, the most evil and corruptive in this field...’ (1998, 213).

So to a large extent, the discipline is marked by two contrasting approaches in terms of interpreting early ḥadīth literature. Non-Muslim academics have generally shown doubt and suspicion, whereas Muslim academics have merely rebutted western observations and have not appreciated it, with Azami’s On Schacht’s Origins of Muhammadan

⁶ The work pertains to the family Isnād ‘Amr ibn Shu‘ayb ibn Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Amr —— father —— (the latter’s) grandfather —— ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Amr —— Prophet.
Jurisprudence being a prime example. Theoretically, the work of Edward Said on Orientalism is perhaps pivotal in understanding the conflicting conclusions reached by western academics on ḥadīth literature. He argued that the production of knowledge, especially western knowledge on the east, can never be impartial and value-free. Findings and conclusions are influenced by the author’s own social, religious and political position. He implied that:

For if it is true that no production of knowledge in the human sciences can ever ignore or disclaim its author’s involvement as a human subject in his own circumstances, then it must also be true that for a European or American studying the Orient there can be disclaiming the main circumstances of his actuality: that he comes up against the Orient as a European or an American first, as an individual second (1995, 11).

But the same applies to Muslims studying Islam too. They come up against their religion as a Muslim first, and then as an individual academic. This explains their robust rebuttal of any criticism directed at the second principal source of Islam.

My commentary – it is hoped – will avoid these two extremes. With western works on ḥadīth, I will attempt to appreciate their endeavours and not just refute them as many Muslim observers have done. With Muslims’ works on the Nuzhah, I will explore the rich commentary offered by the Muslim scholars like al-Munāwī and al-Qārī. Such works are crucially important because they offer an analysis of ḥadīth through the prism of ‘ilm alhadīth literature. In order to do this, I will have to display impartiality and act as a researcher first and foremost, not as a Muslim.

In brief, through the means of the commentary I intend to:

- assess what the Nuzhah indicated about the social and academic climate of the ninth Islamic century.
- through comparison with earlier and later works, ask what the Nuzhah said about the development (or lack of it) of 'ilm al-hadīth by that era.
- display a balanced criticism between the Muslim and non-Muslim scholars.
- enquire how the field of hadīth related to others such as fiqh using the Nuzhah as a basis.
- show the pedagogical nature of the work.
- ask what Ibn Ḥajar’s writings highlighted about the relationship between the isnād and matn, and what it said about the usage of technical terms.
- show how the interaction between Muslims and non-Muslims in the field has brought benefit and indeed loss.

1.3Presentation of the thesis and章tering.

This thesis will consist of many chapters, all aimed at offering an extensive and useful overview of the Nuzhah. In order to reach this objective and to fully appreciate the work in the wider context, the thesis will commence with a brief overview of the life and works of Ibn Ḥajar al-‘Asqalānī. This will allow us to assess his authority in the field and will help answer wider questions on the importance of the Nuzhah.

Ibn Ḥajar al-‘Asqalānī was preceded by a long line of ḥadīth masters who made invaluable contributions to the field. The richness and depth of the discipline we appreciate today was only possible thanks to the input of scholars like al-Rāmahurmuzī (d. 360/970), al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī (d. 463/1071) and Ibn Ṣalāh (d. 643/1245). On this basis, it is only befitting that a section of the thesis is devoted to the ḥadīth works preceding the Nuzhah. The need for this is further amplified when we note that in his own introduction to the Nuzhah, Ibn Ḥajar paid tribute to seven important milestone works that preceded him. The literature assessment will thus provide an insight into how important the Nuzhah is in the historical context of ḥadīth literature.

The following chapter will focus exclusively on the Nuzhah. It will be shown how this work relates to the Nukhbah, and where the work fits in with the development of ʿilm al-ḥadīth literature between the third and ninth Islamic century.

The main section – chapter five – will primarily have two aims: to present a lucid translation of the Nuzhah and to offer a detailed commentary and analysis. To fulfil these aims, the simplest and most effective method of presentation is to divide the works into two sections. The first section would offer the translation of the text void of additional notes and commentary. The second section would provide a detailed analysis of selected areas. The advantage of such a method is that the reader can easily refer to the translation without being deterred by the commentary. If and when required, he/she can refer to the commentary in the second section.

However, after much deliberation and thought, I decided that the translation and commentary should be provided together (with the translation in bold font and the commentary in normal font). There are two reasons for this. Firstly, in many areas of the Nuzhah, a detailed and lengthy commentary is not required, but rather a simple section to clarify key points. Without any deviation and distraction from the main translated text, the reader will be able to refer to this if required, rather than continuously referring to the second section.

Secondly, by adopting such an approach in the presentation, the work will resemble the method used by classic scholars in their commentaries, and indeed what Ibn Ḥajar used for his own commentary on the Nukhbah. Thus it is appropriate to assess a classic treatise, in a style and method favoured by the classics.

Thus the thesis will be divided into the following chapters:

1. Introduction to the thesis.
2. The life and works of Ibn Ḥajar.
3. The Nuzhah of Ibn Ḥajar; the Author’s Introduction and the related literature.
4. The Nuzhah of Ibn Ḥajar.
5. The Main Section; a translation of the Nuzhah, with commentary and critical analysis.
6. Findings of the commentary.
7. Conclusion.
It is sincerely hoped that the thesis will expose some very important points and display an original contribution to knowledge.
2.0. The Life and Works of Ibn Ḥajar al-‘Asqalānī.

2.1. Introduction.

Nuzhat al-nazar fī tawdīḥ nukhbat al-fikar is one of the most famous and widely-used treatises on the discipline of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. The author of this important work was Ibn Ḥajar al-‘Asqalānī, who was born in 773 A.H./1372 C.E. In order to gain a fruitful insight into the Nuzhah – which is the primary focus of the thesis – it is important that an effort is made to understand the author behind the work. By assessing his ability, his other works and what he was like as an individual, we can better evaluate the significance of the Nuzhah, how it came about and how the era may have influenced the actual work.

2.3. His parents.

Ibn Ḥajar’s father, Nūr al-Dīn ‘Alī, was a Shāfi‘ī scholar who excelled in fiqh, Arabic, literature and poetry. Sources states that he was known for his knowledge, piety, trustworthiness and exemplary moral character. He died in 777/1375 in the month of Rajab when Ibn Ḥajar was four years old (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 92; al-Wajīdī 1996, 13). His mother died before this, and thus his sister Sitt al-Rakb assumed the responsibility to raise him (al-Wajīdī 1996, 13). She undertook this duty under the guardianship of the brother of his father’s first wife, Zakī al-Dīn al-Kharrūbī, who was a renowned and affluent trader (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 93).

2.4. His education.

Despite the early setback of losing both parents, Ibn Ḥajar’s religious education was given utmost attention. At the age of five, his formal Islamic education commenced with the memorisation of the Qur’ān, and by the age of nine, he had completed it under the guidance of Ṣadr al-Dīn Muḥammad ibn Muḥammad al-Safī (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 94). The practice of the time (as indeed today) was to allow newly-graduated Qur’ān memorisers to recite it in its entirety in tarāwīh prayers during the month of Ramaḍān. Because laws of sharī‘a stipulate that the imām must be mature (bāligh) to lead the Prayer, Ibn Ḥajar had to wait three years – when he reached the age of twelve – to fulfil this practice (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 94). His wait was rewarded when he received the honour of leading the Prayers at the Sacred Mosque in Makka, in the companionship of his early mentor and teacher Zakī al-Dīn al-Kharrūbī.

Thus by the age of twelve, Ibn Ḥajar reached a landmark achievement that the majority of other Muslims could only dream of. He led the tarāwīh prayers in the holiest mosque in Islam, a commendable accolade.
Ibn Ḥajar was fortunate to learn from the best scholars of his generation in a variety of Islamic disciplines. His astute memory and intelligence attracted the attention of the leading shaykhs of the time. After the demise of his early teacher Zakī al-Dīn al-Kharrūbī, Shams al-Dīn ibn al-Qaṭṭān⁷ (737-813/1336-1410) took responsibility for his education. Ibn Ḥajar took jurisprudence and Arabic from him (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 96). Al-Qaṭṭān then entered him in the courses given by the great Cairene scholars al-Bulqīn (d. 806/1403) and Ibn al-Mulaqqin (d. 804/1401) in Shāfi’ī fiqh. He also benefited from the likes of Ibrāhīm Burhān al-Dīn al-Shāmī (709-800/1309-1397)⁸, Mūḥammad ibn Mūḥammad ibn Mūḥammad ibn Mūḥammad ibn Sulaymān al-Nisābūrī (705-790/1305-1388)⁹, Ibrāhīm ibn Aḥmad al-Tanākhī (709-800/1309-1397)¹⁰, Nūr al-Dīn al-Miṣrī (735-807/1335-1405), known famously as al-Haythām¹², Mūḥammad ibn ‘Abd Allāh al-Makhzūmī (751-817/1350-1414)¹³ and Ibrāhīm ibn Mūsā al-Abnāsī (725-802/1324-1399)¹⁴.⁷

⁸ Ibn Ḥajar recited the seven readings of the Qur’ān from the beginning to Sūrat al-Muḥādthin with him, as well as the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 103).
¹⁰ He was a ḥadith master of Makka and one of the first teachers Ibn Ḥajar took hadīth from (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 103).
¹⁴ He was born in the Egyptian village of Abnās and moved to Cairo in his youth. He gained proficiency in fiqh and studied hadīth in Cairo, Makka and Syria. He later became a teacher and Muftī at al-Azhar Importantly, it was the stature of these men which certainly shaped Ibn Ḥajar’s own education, simply because each of these teachers were men of outstanding ability themselves. Ibn Ḥajar’s student al-Sakhāwī (831-902/1328-1497) notes that it was precisely because of the academic support available to him that he was able to excel as a religious expert. He writes:

He amassed shaykhs which his contemporaries did not amass. All of his shaykhs were experts and renowned authorities in their respective disciplines. Thus al-Tanūkhī [was an expert] in qirāʿa; al-ʻIrāqī in ḥadīth and related disciplines; al-Haythamī in prophetic texts; al-Bulqīnī in his outstanding memory and awareness: Ibn al-Mulaqqin in his countless written works… (in al-Qārī 1994, 33).

Perhaps the most renowned of these early teachers was Ḥāfīz Zayn al-Dīn ʻAbd al-Rahīm ibn Ḥusayn al-ʻIrāqī (d. 806/1403). 15 He spent approximately ten years studying ḥadīth with him (Ahmadayn 1958, 9; al-Barrī et al. 1995, 96). It was here he was given the title of ḥāfīz, as a tribute to his proficiency and expertise in ḥadīth (Anwar 2003, 21). Al-ʻIrāqī described him as his ‘most learned disciple in ḥadīth’ (al-Wajīdī 1996, 14).

University (al-Qārī 1994, 29). Ibn Ḥajar acknowledged the vast contribution he made to his academic development on countless occasions (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 104)

15 Ibn Ḥajar first became his disciple in 786/1384 and later studied under his guidance for ten years (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 103). Al-Ḥāfīz al-ʻIrāqī originated from Kurd and migrated to Cairo as a youngster. His extensive travels took him to the leading teachers of his time. His famous works are Dhayl ʿalā al-mīzān, al-Alfiyya, and its commentary Fath al-mugīth (al-Qārī 1994, 31).
Ibn Ḥajar was able to excel in all fields not only because of the famous teachers behind him, but because he had a sustained love for learning. For example, on his first trip to Makka, his main intention was to perform the Ḥajj. Yet he also found time to memorise ‘Umdat al-ahkām under Ḥāfīz al-Jamāl ibn Zahīra, a renowned scholar of Ḥijāz (al-Bārī et al. 1995, 95). Like many great scholars, Ibn Ḥajar travelled extensively to learn. For instance, he travelled to Damascus and Jerusalem, where he studied under the likes of Shams al-Dīn al-Qalqashandī (d. 809/1406) and Badr al-Dīn al-Balīṣī (d. 803/1400), as well as Yemen. Additionally, Ibn Ḥajar did not merely study the important books, but memorised them too. He memorised the text Mukhtaṣar of Ibn al-Hājib on uṣūl, al-‘Umda, al-Alfiyya and al-Ḥāwī al-ṣaghīr (al-Qārī 1994, 26). Ibn Ḥajar as a teacher also depended heavily on his memory and in fact showed surprise to others who did not. He ‘reported as a novel practice that one of his biographees “used to teach law from a book!”’ (Makdisi 1981, 148).

2.5. His career.

Ibn Ḥajar occupied many important posts during his life. Firstly, he undertook the responsibility of delivering sermons in several mosques in Cairo, including the prestigious Azhar and ‘Amr (al-Bārī et al. 1995, 100; al-Wājīdī 1996, 14). Secondly, he taught numerous religious sciences in various seats of learning. For instance:

iii. At al-Madrasa al-Ṣalāhiyya, which was built by Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Ayyūbī (al-Munāwī 1999, 1: 121; al-Barrī et al. 1995, 102), he taught ḥadīth.

iv. He also taught at Dār al-Ḥadīth al-Ḵāmiliyya,

v. He also taught at Jāmi’ al-Qal’a (founded by al-Nāṣir Muḥammad ibn Qalāwan in 718/1318), vi. At al-Madrasa al-Ḥasaniyya, he taught exegesis.

vii. He also taught exegesis at al-Madrasa al-Ḥusayniyya and al-Manṣūriyya (al-Qārī 1994, 52).

viii. He taught ḥadīth at al-Madrasa al-Zayniyya (al-Qārī 1994, 53)

ix. He dictated ḥadīth at al-Madrasa al-Maḥmūdiyya (Ibid.).

Two points are worthy of mention here. Firstly, Ibn Ḥajar primarily occupied himself with the study and teaching of ḥadīth, though he was competent enough to teach other disciplines like jurisprudence and exegesis. He was known as a ḥadīth scholar first and foremost and certainly the extensive literature on ḥadīth and ‘ilm al-ḥadīth he produced reflects this point too.

Secondly, the periods he spent in these numerous institutions were relatively short. This was normal practice for the time. Esteemed scholars were known to extend their knowledge and reach to as many places as possible. However, the exception was the ṣūfī lodges (khanqah) of Baybars in Cairo, where he taught for over twenty years. Perhaps the prolonged period here was a result of his love for the ṣūfī mystics and their way of life.
Ibn Ḥajar also served as the chief justice of Egypt for some time. He undertook this responsibility in the judiciary in 827/1423 and fulfilled this until 852/1449 (Aḥmadayn 1958, 10; al-Barrī et al. 1995, 102). His experience as a judge was not pleasant overall, as he was appointed, dismissed and re-appointed several times. More will be mentioned on this in section 5.19.

2.6. The climate of Mamluk Cairo.

The outline of his career and the factors that shaped it were to some extent a product of the tense political atmosphere of Mamluk Cairo at the time. During Ibn Ḥajar’s time, there was a degree of dependency between the all-important military elite and the religious scholars in Mamluk Cairo. The military provided the financial and material patronage to the scholars in return for legitimation and integration into Cairo’s dominant Islamic environment (Broadbridge 1999, 85). But the frequent tensions at state level affected the position of the scholars and their proximity to the corridors of power. The death of a sultan provoked shifts in the power relations within the military rule and, by extension, could alter the way certain scholars were treated (Broadbridge 1999, 89).

Ibn Ḥajar’s early career was a product of the good relationship with the power elite. Upon his return to Cairo in 806/1403-4, Ibn Ḥajar quickly established himself as a force in Cairene intellectual society under the son and successor of Barqūq, al-Nāṣir Faraj (Broadbridge 1999, 90).
Broadbridge notes that compared with other notable scholars of his time, al-Maqrízī in particular, Ibn Ḥajār endured a relatively stable relation in a system that encouraged patronage (1999, 93). In 822/1419, al-Mu’ayyad Shaykh (815-24/1412-21) asked Ibn Ḥajār to judge in the case of al-Harawī, who had been accused of embezzlement. After Ibn Ḥajār’s successful resolution of the case, he was appointed instructor of Shāfi’ī fiqh at the Mu’ayyadi mosque, which was one of the two most important mosques of Shaykh’s regime in terms of patronage (1999, 95).

When relations were not at their best, he still persevered and seldom spoke out. He did not enjoy the best personal relationship with Barsbāy but that did not lead to public attacks on him. This was down to his character. He was a scholar who occupied a ‘moral middle ground’, as Chamberlain described it (in Broadbridge 1999, 97). He found it difficult to maintain his justness and politeness which he inherently had, in a corrupt and short-sighted political climate (ibid.)

2.7. His literary works.

Ibn Ḥajār’s ability is perhaps best reflected by the vast number of quality, literary works he produced during his lifetime. The majority of these works relate to ḥadīth and īlm al-ḥadīth. Estimates vary, but it is clear he wrote over one hundred and fifty books and treatises (Anwar 2003, 21: al-Munāwī 1999, 1: 123). Many of his works are still highly regarded today by Muslim scholars. His student al-Sakhāwī wrote:
His works exceeded – of which most were in the disciplines of ḥadīth, adab and fiqh – more than one hundred and fifty. All were universally acclaimed, particularly Fath al-bārī bi sharḥ ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī (in al-Barrī et al. 1995, 106).

A list of his known literary works has been listed in Appendix A, at the end of the thesis.

Today, Ibn Ḥajar is primarily remembered in the Muslim world as the author of a detailed commentary on the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-ʿImām al-Bukhārī. This work, called Fath al-bārī, is perhaps the magnum opus of his literary works. He began this project in 817/1414, as he taught the Ṣaḥīḥ to his ḥadīth students in Cairo. His disciples would record his dictations and soon these notes took on the form of a book. The work was not even complete yet it still warranted attention from leading figures around the Muslim world. In 833/1429, Timur’s son Shāhrūkh sent a letter to the Mamluk sultan al-Ashraf Barsbāy requesting several gifts, including a copy of Fath al-bārī. Ibn Ḥajar sent him the first three volumes. Similarly, the Moroccan sultan Abū Fāris ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz al-Ḥaṣṣī requested a copy before its completion. When it was finally finished in 842/1438, a great celebration was held in Cairo, in the presence of leading Cairean dignitaries, scholars and judges (al-Wajīdī 1996, 15). Ibn Ḥajar sat on a platform and read out the final pages of his work, after which poets recited eulogies.

The reputation of Fath al-bārī today is unquestioned in the Muslim world. But during his life, Ibn Ḥajar must have enjoyed semi-celebrity status for his masterpiece to attract attention from leading dignitaries, even before he had completed writing it.
There are a few points worthy of contemplation regarding his vast literary works.

a. Firstly, his works related to fiqh were not only focussed on his own school of thought (Shāfi‘ī). Al-Dirāya, for example, identified the prophetic narrations used in the Ḥanafī manual on fiqh, al-Hidāya. This shows that Ibn Ḥajar had utmost respect for religious sciences in general, and was not prejudiced in favour certain categories of works and scholars.

b. Secondly, many of his works were geared towards supplementing the works of previous scholars. For instance, al-Istidrāk ‘alā al-Ḥafīẓ al-‘Irāqī fī takhrīj aḥādīth al-Ihyā’ was written to identify the original sources of the prophetic narrations used in the Ihya ‘ulūm al-dīn of Imām Ghazālī and Takhrīj aḥādīth al-arba’ in li-al-Nawawī did the same for the Forty Ḥadīth of al-Nawawī. This shows that as a Muslim, he had a degree of respect for scholars, classical and contemporary, and wished to advance the popularity of such works. Perhaps more importantly, it indicates the type of literary works that were popular and in demand in the ninth Islamic century. Rather than original and ground-breaking material, the scholars had resigned themselves to improving and editing existing works prior to them.

c. Thirdly, though he wrote works in all Islamic disciplines, the majority of his works related to ḥadīth and ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. This in turn means that the Nuzhah is by no means a true reflection of the depth of his knowledge in ‘ilm al-ḥadīth; it is merely a manual covering the discipline in general. For instance, a very brief analysis of muṣḥarīb is offered in the Nuzhah. The extent of his knowledge on this type of tradition is reflected in his separate treatise on the topic, al-Muqta rīb fī bayān al-muḍṭarīb. The same applies to his works like al-Alqāb, Bayān al-faṣl bi-mā rujjiḥa fīhi al-irsāl ‘alā al-waṣl and al-Ta’rīj ‘alā al-tadrīj, to mention a few. These are all separate, detailed works on different areas of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth that he simply touched upon in the Nuzhah.

The Nuzhah is still significant however because it is the only work of his where he analysed the discipline of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth as a whole. Certainly, Ibn Ḥajar himself emphasised the importance of the Nuzhah from his vast literary works. He only expressed pride in a handful of his books, and the Nuzhah was one of them (al-Munāwī 1999, 1: 27).

2.8. The moral development of Ibn Ḥajar; his outlook as an individual.

To his contemporaries, Ibn Ḥajar was a simple and devout Muslim. He was known as a gentle man, who was inclined to charity and kind-heartedness. Those who knew him acknowledged his willingness to be good to those who wronged him and forgiving to those he was able to punish. He was very spiritually-centred as an individual. The extended time teaching in the šūfī lodge of Baybars for approximately twenty years must have played a role in determining his outlook. Alternatively, it could be argued that a lifetime of studying the traditions of the Messenger had imbued him with a deep love for his morally-upright example.

16 This will be referred to in Section 5.31.
Ibn Ḥajar’s wife too played a role. When he reached the age of twenty-five, he married Ānas Khātūn (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 97), in 798/1395. She was the daughter of al-Qāḍī Karīm al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Karīm ibn ‘Abd al-Azīz. Ānas was a ḥadīth scholar too, having studied under al-‘Irāqī just like Ibn Ḥajar did. Observers note that she always surrounded herself with the poor, the old and the physically handicapped, whom it was her privilege and pleasure to support.

Ibn Ḥajar passed this love of Islam on to his children. His wife had four daughters with Ibn Ḥajar: Zayn Khātūn, Farḥa, ‘Āliya and Fāṭima. Ibn Ḥajar had one son – Badr al-Dīn Muḥammad – from a later marriage (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 100). Ibn Ḥajar paid utmost attention to his religious education and development. He memorised the Qur’ān and led tarāwīḥ prayers in 826/1422. The book Bulūgh al-mara’ūm min adillat al-ḥukūm was written by Ibn Ḥajar as a dedication to his son (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 101).

As far as the Nuzhah is concerned, there are places in the work where his moral outlook as a good Muslim is reflected in his writings as an academic. For instance, he sometimes corrects and refutes the opinions of previous ḥadīth scholars, mainly related to the use of certain ḥadīth terminologies. The tone and style employed by Ibn Ḥajar suggests subtlety and respect, even when he does not agree with someone.

2.9. Conclusion.

The fame and acceptance that he enjoyed throughout his life extended to his demise too, since even his funeral turned into a major event. Following his death on the twenty-eighth of Dhūl Ḥijjah in 852/22nd February 1449 (Anwar 2003, 21), fifty thousand people, including the Sultan and Caliph, attended his funeral.
In relation to the Nuzhah, the analysis has indicated that:

a. Ibn Ḥajar was first and foremost a hadith scholar. Therefore, this may suggest his preference to focus on this alone, rather than fiqh and other disciplines in the Nuzhah.

b. Ibn Ḥajar was a spiritually-inclined Muslim. This may manifest itself in the Nuzhah via the non-confrontational approach he chooses to adopt.

c. He lived in a turbulent political climate. His character helped immensely in overcoming such hurdles.

d. Many of his literary works were improvements of previous literature in the Islamic sciences. This could indicate that Ibn Ḥajar lacked originality. Alternatively, it could say something about academia in the ninth century in that it was largely void of pioneers and original thinkers.

Where and when required, these themes will be referred to during the thesis.

To conclude, from the abundance of material we have on his life and works, it is explicitly clear that Ibn Ḥajar al-'Asqalānī was a famed and revered ḥadīth scholar. There is no shortage of praise from fellow Muslim scholars, who have described him with unique and outstanding qualities. Al-Munāwī (d. 1021/1612) praised him with the following words:

> The unique of his time, the bearer of the flag of the sunna in his time…the jewel who has been a source of pride for many generations, the imām of this discipline and the forerunner of the army of ḥadīth experts, the resort of the people in [ḥadīth] authentication and dis-accreditation … (1999, 1: 117)
Al-Qārī (d. 1014/1605) wrote a detailed commentary on the Nuzhah. He commenced it with the following words of praise for Ibn Ḥajar:

…our leader, the shaykh of our own shaykhs, our dependable, the finest of the outstanding scholars…Shaykh al-Islām, and the seal of the ḥuffāz and ḥadīth masters…Shaykh, Shihāb al-Dīn Aḥmad ibn Ḥajar al-‘Asqalānī… (1994, 118).

Many titles have been bestowed on him, to reflect his position in the discipline. Fellow Muslim scholars used the term Shaykh al-Islām and Amīr al-muʾminūn fi-al-ḥadīth 17 when referring to him (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 102). This latter title has usually been reserved for the elite of ḥadīth masters, such as al-Imām al-Bukhārī.

But it is the title of ‘the seal of the ḥuffāz’ (khātam al-ḥuffāz) which perhaps best indicates his rank. It is as if he was the last great ḥadīth master to have existed (and therefore the Nuzhah was the last great work on the subject). This title is a great compliment to Ibn Ḥajar because it reflects his expertise in ḥadīth. But for that era, the title can be interpreted as anything but complimentary. This is because it suggests that after Ibn Ḥajar, the discipline of ʿilm al-ḥadīth resigned itself to apathy and passiveness. It suggests that by the era of Ibn Ḥajar, the field of ḥadīth had been deprived of fresh methodology and analysis of the prophetic traditions. He was the last great ḥadīth master, who himself resorted to improving, commentating and editing literature that preceded him by centuries.

3.0. The Nuzhah of Ibn Ḥajar; the Author’s Introduction and the Related Literature.

As mentioned in the introduction, one of the aims of this thesis is to assess the Nuzhah in light of the ninth Islamic century, namely the academic, religious and social climate of that period. This aim will be mainly fulfilled in section five, where a critical commentary will be offered of the Nuzhah. In part, however, the same issue will also be tackled in this section (albeit through a different approach) by looking at a brief, historical account of the ‘ilm al-ḥadīth literature that preceded the Nuzhah.

A historical account of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth literature is pivotal towards us gaining a sound appreciation of the Nuzhah. Ibn Ḥajar’s work was not the first work in the field, or the last. It was neither the shortest nor the longest. Yet it certainly was and still is one of the most popular. By assessing the literature that preceded him, we can understand why the Nuzhah became so popular. Moreover, such an account will help us evaluate whether the Nuzhah was filling a void that had hitherto been unaddressed by his predecessors. Or, alternatively, it can assist in answering whether the Nuzhah was merely one treatise on ‘ilm al-ḥadīth, like the many before and after it.

In order to present a background to the literature in ‘ilm al-ḥadīth prior to the Nuzhah, I have used Ibn Ḥajar’s own introduction to the Nuzhah as the basis in this chapter18, since 18 In this chapter and the main section, the translation of the Nuzhah has been presented in bold font.

he reviews key works that preceded him in this short introduction. Though he obviously does not mention every work that came before him, the books he does quote gives us an insight into the works which he personally saw as significant.

His introduction also indicates why he wrote the Nuzhah, and where this work lies in relation to his shorter work Nukhbat al-fikar. To conclude the chapter, I will assess the worth of the Nuzhah in relation to the development of ‘ilm al-hadīth literature throughout the centuries. Two opinions will be presented. One suggests that the Nuzhah holds a substantially important place in ‘ilm al-hadīth literature. The second implies that the Nuzhah was typical of its era, and that the work highlighted the stagnant nature of the development of ‘ilm al-hadīth literature as a whole.

The Shaykh, the Imām, scholar, practising [on what he knows], the Ḥāfīz\(^{19}\), the exceptional of his time, the unique of his generation, meteor of the religion, Abū al-Faḍl Āḥmad ibn ‘Alī al-‘Asqālānī, famous by the title ‘Ibn Ḥajar’\(^{20}\) – may Allāh reward him with Paradise, through His grace and favour – writes;

In the Name of Allāh, Most Merciful and Benevolent.

\(^{19}\) The word Ḥāfīz literally means ‘someone who memorises.’ In the discipline of ‘ilm al-hadīth, it refers to someone who has memorised over one-hundred thousand prophetic reports (Mighālwi 2003, 27). The writings of earlier scholars suggest that Ḥāfīz and muḥaddith are synonymous terms. Later scholars explain a subtle difference; that a Ḥāfīz is a title of higher rank. ‘Alī al-Qārī writes that it refers to a scholar who has memorised at least one-hundred thousand prophetic reports (Khalīfa 2003, 42).

\(^{20}\) It is not clear where the title Ibn Ḥajar originated. Some scholars believe it was a title he was given as he accumulated a small wealth of gold and silver. Others believe the title has a metaphorical connotation: his thought and astuteness was as rigid as stone. Another opinion is that the fifth generation down from his father’s side was called Ḥajar (Ṣabāgh 1990, p. viii). All these reasons are plausible.
All praise is to Allāh, Who remains the All-Knowing, All-Able, the Ever-Living, the Firm, the All-Listening, and All-Seeing. I testify that there is no god except Allāh, He is Alone with no partner and I glorify Him excessively.

I testify that Muḥammad ﷺ is His Servant and Messenger. May Allāh send blessings upon our Leader Prophet Muḥammad, who was sent to humanity in its entirety, as a bringer of glad-tidings and as a warner. And many salutations be upon his family and his Companions.

Undoubtedly, there is an abundance of literature in the science of ḥadīth, [written] by classical and contemporary scholars. Amongst the first to write in this area was al-Qāḍī Abū Muḥammad al-Rāmahurmuzī, his book called al-Muḥaddith al-fāṣil. However, he did not complete this work. Then came al-Ḥākim Abū ‘Abd Allāh al-Nisābūrī but the book was not ordered systematically or refined. He was followed by Abū Nu‘aym al-Iṣbahānī, who added to his predecessor’s works, and left out areas for those after him [to complete]. Then came al-Khaṭīb Abū Bakr al-Baghdādī. Thus he wrote al-Kifāya on the rules of narration and al-Jāmi‘ li akhlāq al-rāwī wa ʿādāb al-sāmi‘, on the etiquettes of narration. [In fact] he wrote separate treatises on almost all areas of ḥadīth criticism. As al-Ḥāfiẓ Abū Bakr ibn Nuqṭa said: ‘Every impartial observer knows that all ḥadīth scholars after al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī were dependant upon his books.’

Then after them came others and they took a portion from this knowledge. Thus al-Qāḍī ‘Iyāḍ compiled a wonderful book which he called al-Ilmā and Abū Ḥafṣ al-Mayyānishī wrote a pamphlet called Mā lā yasa‘u al-muḥaddith jahlūḥū.
Examples of these literary works which became famous are plentiful, (of which) some were detailed to offer comprehensive knowledge, and some were abridged (to make understanding easy).

(This was such) until al-Ḥāfiẓ al-Faqīḥ Taqī al-Dīn Abū ʿAmr ʿUthmān ibn al-Ṣalāḥ ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Shahrazūrī, resident of Damascus, appeared. He gathered his famous book when he took over teaching at al-Madrasa al-Ashrafiyya. He refined the fields of ḥadīth (in this piece) and dictated it bit by bit. For this reason, its order was not achieved in a suitable manner. He included the various works of al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, gathering its antecedent points and adding selected beneficial points himself. In this book, he gathered what had hitherto been scattered in different books. For this reason, people adhered to it and followed its path. The book resulted in countless literature devoted to it, such as poems, abridged versions, commentaries, shortened versions and (indeed) critical literature.

3. 1. The Existing Literature.

Ibn Ḥajar begins the book – after the customary praise of Allāh and salutations and blessings upon Prophet Mūḥammad – with a brief overview of the existing literature in the field of ʿilm al-ḥadīth. Though the works mentioned are by no means exhaustive, he does refer to the key works on this subject prior to him. The works and authors he refers to are;

i. Al-Muḥaddith al-fāṣil bayn al-rāwi wa-al-wāʾī.

By Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan ibn ʿAbd al-Raḥmān ibn al-Khallād al-Rāmahurmuzī (d. 360/970).
Almost certainly, al-Muḥaddīth was the first piece of work on ‘ilm al-ḥadīth that encompassed the discipline as a whole.

The works include discussions on areas such as the etiquettes of the narrator and ḥadīth master, methods of delivery and the efforts of ḥadīth masters in the pursuit of knowledge.

As Ibn Ḥajar notes, the pioneering work of al-Rāmahurmuzī was not complete, precisely because it was the first treatise written specifically in ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. More crucially, the timing of the book is important to note. It was the middle of the fourth century – when ḥadīth reporting and collecting was in its full swing – before an individual and exclusive treatise on ‘ilm al-ḥadīth first appeared. This indicates that to some extent at least, the ‘ilm al-ḥadīth scholars had to write what had happened in the field and not what should happen. In other words, the work of al-Rāmahurmuzī was in part descriptive rather prescriptive.

ii. Maʿrifat ‘ulūm al-ḥadīth.

By Abū ‘Abd Allāh Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd Allāh al-Nīsābūrī (d. 405/1014).

Though it was not systematically ordered, the author addressed fifty sections relating to the rules of narration.

21 Although al-Muḥaddīth al-fāsīl was most certainly the pioneering treatise on the discipline, it does not mean it was the first time the rules pertaining to ‘ilm al-ḥadīth were written down. Prior to this, treatises could be found on an array of individual topics, such as the words of accreditation and dis-accreditation, the narrations of seniors from juniors, and the biographical details of reporters. For example, the Risāla of al-Imām al-Shāfiʿī (150/767-204/820) did contain random writings on ‘ilm riwāyat al-ḥadīth (Siddiqi 1993, 108). Muslim’s (d. 261/874) introduction to his Sahīḥ also contained various rules regarding the discipline (Khalīfa 1983, 10). Al-Tirmidhī included key ‘ilm al-ḥadīth terminologies at the end of al-‘Ilal al-mufrad and at the end of his Sunan (Khalīfa 1983, 10). Al-Rāmahurmuzī’s contribution was to attempt to amass these rulings into one document.

22 Abū ‘Abd Allāh Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd Allāh ibn Muḥammad ibn Ḥamdawīyya al-Nīsābūrī, known as al-Ḥākim, was one of the most respected authorities in the field of ḥadīth. Author of the famous al-Mustadrak ‘alā al-sahihayn, he was born in 321/933 and died in 405/1014. He was a prolific writer with approximately fifteen hundred books to his name, including al-‘Ilal and Fawāʾid al-shaykhī. His quest for knowledge took him to Hijāz and ‘Irāq. In 359 he was appointed as the judge of his birthplace Nīsābūr. (Migālwī 2003, 68-69).

By Abū Nu‘aym al-Iṣbahānī (d. 430/1038).23

The term used by Ibn Ḥajar to describe this book in relation to the work of al-Ḥakim is that it is a mustakhraj.24 This indicates that al-Iṣbahānī most certainly took the works of al-Ḥakim as his starting point, and wrote on areas he had left out, or expanded on parts which had been left brief. However, as Ibn Ḥajar points out, his efforts were incomplete. This indicates a theme that perhaps marks the discipline as a whole; dependency and improvements on the works of others and not a desire to innovate and think outside the box.

Al-Kifāya dealt primarily with the rules of narrations that disciples were expected to adhere to. Al-Jāmi’ was a more extensive treatise, covering areas such as how to respect the muḥaddith, who a disciple should avoid taking traditions from and the etiquettes of listening.

23 Abū Nu‘aym Ahmad ibn ‘Abd Allāh ibn Ishāq al-Iṣbahānī was one of the most celebrated classical scholars. He had permission to hear ḥadīth from his teachers at the age of six. He heard ḥadīth from – amongst others – al-Ṭabarānī and counts al-Khaṭīb Abū Bakr al-Baghdādī as one of his close disciples. Al-Iṣbahānī’s other works include Ḥilyat al-awliyā, Ma’rifat al-ṣahāba, Kitāb dalā’īl al-nubuwwa, Kitāb al-mustakhraj ‘alā al-Bukhārī and Ṭabaqāt al-asfiyā. He died in 430/1038, at the age of 94 (al-Wajīfī 1996, 20).

24 In ‘ilm al-ḥadīth terminology, this refers to when a ḥadīth master takes an existing book of ḥadīth and derives the isnāds for each narration himself (Ṭahḥān 2001, 32).

25 Abū Bakr Ahmad ibn ‘Ali ibn Thabit ibn Aḥmad ibn Mahdī al-Baghdādī was perhaps one of the most important figures in the field of ḥadīth ever to have existed. Born in 392/1002, al-Baghdādī became a master of ḥadīth, History, Jurisprudence, Doctrines to mention but a few fields of knowledge (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 397). The historian al-Dhahabi described him as ‘the most peerless Imām, erudite scholar and muftī, meticulous hadith master, scholar of his time in hadith, prolific author, and seal of hadith masters’ (1994, 31: 86). His most famous works were al-Rihla fi jālāb al-ḥadīth, Tārīkh Baghdad, al-Kifāya fi ‘ilm al-riwāya and al-Jāmi’ li akhlāq al-rāwī wa ādāb al-sāmi’. He died in 463/1071.
vi. al-‘Ilmā’ ilā ma‘rifat al-riwāya wa taqyīd al-samā’.

Al-Qāḍī ‘Iyād.26

This text was by no means a comprehensive one on ‘ilm al-ḥadīth; the book primarily dealt with the process of receiving and passing on narration (al-tahammul wa-al-adā’). Nevertheless the work was commended for its clarity and layout (Ṭāḥān 2001, 10).

Abū Hafṣ al-Mayyānishī (d. 580/1184).

This short work offered a brief yet precise guide to the technical terms used in the discipline.

viii. Muqaddima (‘Ulūm al-ḥadīth).

Though the work is officially known as ‘Ulūm al-ḥadīth, it is popularly referred to as Muqaddimat Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ. As Ibn Ḥajar notes, the book became an important milestone in ‘ilm al-ḥadīth literature due to its scope, clarity and comprehensiveness. He drew on the works of his predecessors, such as al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, and gathered sections that had previously not been confined to one work. A minor criticism of the work – as noted by Ibn Ḥajar – was that the order was still somewhat unsystematic. The reason for this was that, according to Ibn Ḥajar, Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ did not aim to write the book per se; the works were put together from his lecturing at al-Madrasa al-Ashrafiyya.

As a form of praise for this momentous work, Ibn Ḥajar writes in the introduction that ‘Ulūm al-ḥadīth resulted in a surge of related works. These included nāzīms (poems) like the efforts of Zayn al-Dīn al-‘Irāqī, Mūhammad ibn Aḥmad ibn al-Khāliḥ Shīhāb al-Dīn al-Khūbī and al-Qaḍī Shīhāb al-Dīn al-Ḥarbī (al-Munāwī 1999, 1: 220). It also led to summaries (mukhtāṣar), like the two written by al-Nawawī (d. 676/1277). The first was called al-Taqrīb, upon which Jalāl al-Dīn al-Suyūtī (d. 911/1505) later wrote a commentary entitled Tadrīb al-rāwī fi sharḥ taqrīb al-Nawawī. The second summary was called Kitāb Irshād āṯullāḥ al-ḥaqqā’iq ilā maʿrifat sunan khayr al-khalāʾiq, or al-Irshād for short. Al-Ḥafīz ibn Kathīr wrote his own summary upon the works of al-Nawawī (al-Munāwī 1999, 1: pp. 220-221).

26 Abū al-Faḍl ‘Iyāḍ ibn Mūsā ibn ‘Iyāḍ, better known as al-Qāḍī ‘Iyād, was an exceptional scholar of the fifth/sixth Islamic century. His masterpiece Al-Shifā‘ bi ta’rif ḥuquq al-muṣṭafā refers to the life of Muhammad, and is still universally revered and respected today. He died in 544/1149.

Mustadraks (supplements) were also written on ‘Ulūm al-ḥadīth. This term refers to a literary work where a later author improves and adds to the existing, original work (al-‘Uthaymin 2002, 29). Examples of such works on ‘Ulūm al-ḥadīth are Islāḥ ibn al-Ṣalāḥ, by Maghlaṭāī ibn Qalīj ibn ‘Abd Allāh (d. 762/1360) and Maḥṣīn al-iṣṭilāḥ by al-Imām al-Bulqīnī. In short, Ibn Ḥajar wanted to highlight the importance of ‘Ulūm al-ḥadīth. In fact it still remains a text of paramount importance today.27

Ibn Ḥajar deemed it important to mention these seven treatises that preceded him in the field of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. There were other important works which he did not refer to, such as:

1. Al-Iqtirāḥ fi bayān al-Iṣṭilāh by Ibn Daqīq al-‘Īd (d. 702/1302).

27 The text has recently been rendered into English, by Dr. Eerik Dickinson. (2006) An Introduction to the Science of Hadith (Garnet: Reading, UK).
Of these books, it is most surprising that he did not give his teacher’s work, al-‘Irāqī, a mention. Perhaps because this was based on the Mugaddima of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ, which he does mention in considerable detail, Ibn Ḥajar did not feel the need to refer to the Alfiyya separately.
4.0. The Nuzhah.

Some friends of mine asked me to offer a brief overview of the important parts of this book. Hence I wrote it in a few papers and I named it Nukhbah al-fikar fi muṣṭalaḥ al-athar with an order I produced and a style I pursued, adding unique and additional points. My friends re-approached me and asked me to write a commentary for it, which would unlock its secrets and open its treasures, and expose what had been hidden before. I duly obliged in hope of being included among the people of ḥadīth, and made extensive effort in explaining the hidden facets, since the homeowner knows best as to what is in his home. It became apparent to me that a comprehensive account was more suitable and an amalgamation (of the original and the commentary) was more useful. Hence, I adopted this rare style, and I say, seeking assistance from Allāh…

In the last part of the introduction, Ibn Ḥajar explains how his own book on the subject came about. It is clear from his own wording that he based his work on the writings of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ, but aimed to offer a ‘brief overview of it.’ The result was a small manuscript which he named Nukhbah al-fikar, consisting of only a few pages.\(^{28}\) Clearly, this summary was almost too brief since he was asked to elucidate on the Nukhbah. This second work was called Nuzhat al-nazar. Rather than treating the two works separately, Ibn Ḥajar merged both works together, so it could be studied as one text. The uniqueness of the work is reflected by the fact that the Nukhbah can still be read individually.

\(^{28}\) The Nukhbah has been recently rendered into English, by Musa Furber, in Sunna Notes; Studies in Hadith & Doctrine (Haddad, G. F., 2005, Aqṣa Publications, UK).
4.1. The Relationship between the Nuzhah and Nukhbah al-Fikar.

The request for a small manual on ‘ilm al-hadīth by his contemporaries led to Ibn Ḥajar’s writing the Nukhbah. His second effort – a more-detailed commentary of the Nukhbah – followed and this was called the Nuzhah. What did Ibn Ḥajar do in the Nuzhah which was an addition and improvement on the original Nukhbah? Anwar (2003) comments that by comparing the original Nukhbah and the subsequent Nuzhah, it becomes clear that Ibn Ḥajar focused on improving and developing three areas:

1. Firstly, he geared effort towards what Anwar refers to as tawdīḥ matālib, or clarifying the aims of the book (Anwar 2003, 33). For example, Ibn Ḥajar begins the Nukhbah with the division of different types of khabar. However, he does not mention in detail what is meant by the term khabar in the actual Nukhbah despite the importance of this term. Considerable detail is provided in the Nuzhah, where he provides us with how the term is used, its comparison with the term ḥadīth, and how the term is used in the Arabic language (section 5.2. of this thesis).

2. Anwar writes that the second aim of the Nuzhah was tawjīḥ ‘ibāra, or ‘attention to the text’ (2003, 33). Certainly, this is referring to how the reader is reminded of the meanings and derivations of certain words used in the Nukhbah. For instance, we are reminded that the word ṭuruq is the plural of ṭarīq on the template of jamʾ kathra. It must be noted however that as the book progresses, less emphasis is provided on points relating to the meanings of words in relation to syntax and etymology. Instead, Ibn Ḥajar provides this only in the earlier parts of the Nuzhah.
3. Thirdly, the purpose of the Nuzhah, as expressed by Anwar, was izhār ishāra, or ‘revealing of indications.’ Perhaps this refers to where Ibn Ḥajar gives his own preference over a disputed terminology, or where he expresses his dismay over commonly-misunderstood or misinterpreted matters. For example, Ibn Ḥajar highlights the fact that many have considered iʿtibār a type of ḥadīth, basing this on the sub-heading Maʿrifat al-iʿtibār wa-al-mutābiʿāt wa-al-shawāhid in Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ’s ʿUlūm al-ḥadīth. Iʿtibār – as he rightly points out – is not a type of ḥadīth; rather it is the means of investigation by which mutābiʿs and shāhīds are found.29

4.2. The Unique Qualities of the Nuzhah.

Ibn Ḥajar – as shown in the previous section – was a prolific writer in both ʿilm al-ḥadīth and other Islamic disciplines, writing over one-hundred and fifty works. His student al-Sakhāwī commented that of all his works, he showed pride in only a handful of his works. He writes:

I heard Ibn Ḥajar say: ‘I am not entirely content with any of my literary works, because I initially wrote them and felt the need for re-editing in all of them. The exceptions are Sharḥ ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī, its introduction al-Mushtabih, Tahdhīb [al-tahdhīb] and Lisān al-mīzān.’

[Al-Sakhāwī added]: ‘In fact I have seen him on occasions praise his own Sharḥ ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī, the Taʿlīq and the Nuzhah’ (in al-Munāwī 1999, 1: 27).

29 See section 5.13.
Al-Munāwī echoed the sentiments of Ibn Ḥajar when he identified key and outstanding qualities of the Nuzhah (1999, 1: pp. 29-33). He highlighted the following unique attributes;

1. He gathered the most important elements of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ’s Muqaddima.
2. He arranged the Nukhbah in a pioneering manner not done by his predecessors.
3. He amalgamated the Nukhbah into the Nuzhah in such a way that the Nukhbah can still be read and treated as a separate book.
4. Along with defining and explaining each type of ḥadīth, he supplemented it with examples of each from ḥadīth literature, as well as existing literary works on each particular type. There are exceptions however, like mursal and mudallas; for which he did not provide examples of such traditions, nor did he highlight the works of previous scholars on them.
5. Ibn Ḥajar mainly concentrated on the preferred opinion on disputed issues. There are places however where he did expand into other, weaker opinions on certain issues. For example, he felt the need to highlight and refute the weak opinion of certain scholars who defined a sahīḥ report as one which consists of at least two reporters in each generation.30
6. Ibn Ḥajar felt the need to stress certain points which he felt had been neglected by previous experts in ʿilm al-ḥadīth. When explaining the contrasting difference between mursal and munkatiʿ, for example, he added how certain scholars considered the two types synonymous. And ‘very few are aware of this point’ he wrote.31

30 See section 5.5.
7. Ibn Ḥajar praised the works and efforts of previous Muslim scholars in his Nuzhah. With regards to al-Imām al-Dhahabī, he praised him as a scholar ‘of complete competence in the criticism of [ḥadīth] reporters.’³²

Al-Munāwī’s observations do give an indication of the target audience for the Nuzhah, something which will be addressed as this thesis progresses. It seems the work was primarily aimed to be an introduction to ʿilm al-ḥadīth for young students wishing to learn about the discipline. This is because the Nuzhah defines each type of ḥadīth along with practical examples. Countless sections are concluded with an insight into further literature available and he is keen to highlight the correct opinion on areas that are sources of dispute. If this is true, then the ‘friends of mine [who] asked me to offer a brief overview’ could well have been fellow teachers, who wanted to provide their disciples with an introductory guide to the discipline.

The other point which is apparent from al-Munāwī’s observations is that the improvement was largely in the structure and detail, not necessarily in the content.

4.3. The Nuzhah and the historical development of ʿilm al-ḥadīth

The ʿilm al-ḥadīth literature which Ibn Ḥajar provides in his introduction is useful in providing an insight into how the Nuzhah fits in historically with previous works, and what all this says about the development of the discipline as a whole. There are key observations that are crucial to mention:

³² See section 5.64.
In its earliest form, ‘ilm al-ḥadīth literature took the form of the merging of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth rules and principles within ḥadīth texts that mentioned chains and narrations. This commenced in the second Islamic century, up until the fourth century. Al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī’s al-Umm and the al-Risāla are two examples of works reflecting this stage.

During the second half of the fourth Islamic century, texts on ‘ilm al-ḥadīth exclusively appeared for the first time, as the Nuzhah indicates in the introduction. Most agree that al-Muḥaddith al-fāsil by al-Rāmahurmuzī (d. 360) was the pioneering work in this field.

Thereafter, a pattern emerged in ‘ilm al-ḥadīth literature. After a period of individual treatises on all or part of the disciplines by various scholars, a milestone work would appear that would summarise, elucidate and edit the works preceding it. In the fifth century, Ma‘rīfat ‘ulūm al-ḥadīth of Abū Nu‘aym al-Iṣbāhānī (d. 430/1038) served this function and the next milestone work was most certainly the Muqaddima of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ (d. 643/1245).

Between the Muqaddima of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ and the Nuzhah of Ibn Ḥajar (d. 852/1449), ‘ilm al-ḥadīth literature continued to grow with the appearance of refined works, commentaries and summaries on existing works in ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. But owing to the universal acceptance of the Muqaddima, most literature after it was based on Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ’s work. For example, the Alfiyya of Zayn al-Dīn al-‘Irāqī (d. 806/1403) was based on the works of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ, as was al-Nawawī’s (d. 676/1277) al-Taqrīb.

The Nuzhah of Ibn Ḥajar was the next important – and perhaps the last – milestone work on ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. This is because in essence, subsequent works after it were based on it, just as the Muqaddima of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ led to a surge of related literature before. Al-Munāwī (1999, 1: 34) identifies thirty-six works that are directly based on the Nukhbah or the Nuzhah, in the form of commentaries, ḥāshiyas or nazms. 33 Some were written by esteemed scholars in their own right.

So in essence, the discipline’s literary development can be understood through two important works. The Muqaddima of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ (d. 643/1245) became an important milestone because it summarised the previous important works on the discipline, and it became the foundation upon which many subsequent scholars based their works on. The extensive praise Ibn Ḥajar directs to it in his introduction indicates this fact amply.

Then the Nuzhah of Ibn Ḥajar (d. 852/1449) acted as a summary of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ’s exceptional works and thereafter, a large majority of literature was based on this.

It is quite possible to argue that after the Nuzhah, no independent, fresh and original treatise was written in the field. If it is argued that Tadrīb al-rāwi fī sharḥ taqrīb al-Nawawī, by Jalāl al-Dīn al-Suyūṭī (d. 911/1505), was regarded as an instrumental work after Ibn Ḥajar’s Nuzhah, one can reply by pointing out that even this work was based on al-Nawawī’s work, who based his work on the Muqaddima.

This analysis of Ibn Ḥajar and his Nuzhah thus explains why many scholars consider him as one of the last great ḥāfīzīs. In fact, by referring to him as khātam al-huffāz (the seal of the ḥadīth masters), al-Qārī implicitly suggests that he marked the end of the period of great ḥadīth experts (1994, 118). Ibn Ḥajar’s service to the discipline of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth could be viewed as the last major input; thereafter scholars in the field perhaps passively geared their efforts in consolidating existing works and offering commentaries on the books written by their predecessors. Undoubtedly, this further amplifies the importance of a critical and detailed analysis of his Nuzhah. But this is not to say that the Nuzhah is a true reflection of his in-depth knowledge of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. As we have already shown, he wrote individual treatises on countless areas within the discipline. The Nuzhah is merely an indication to his true wealth of knowledge, not an accurate reflection.

- The introduction of the Nuzhah therefore provides a rough guide to the development of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth literature and how Ibn Ḥajar’s own work fits in. However, the same introduction also indicates another important pattern. Even by Ibn Ḥajar’s own admission, the literature in this field over the centuries largely depended on slightly improving the works of predecessors, rather than a radical review of it. Abū Nu’aym’s efforts were simply geared towards refining the work of al-Hākim, proven by the fact that it is referred to as a mustakhraj. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ’s Muqaddima, despite its importance, can be viewed as an attempt to simply gather the works of previous scholars into one book. There is little or no indication that as time went by, the classification and indeed authentication of prophetic reports was radically overhauled. Instead, it was mildly refined. The Nuzhah was a result of a personal request from Ibn Ḥajar’s contemporaries, rather than an urgent requirement. Even he himself admits that only the approach of writing was original (‘…with an order I produced and a style I pursued…’). Like what had gone on for centuries before, ‘ilm al-hadīth literature never seriously questioned the issue of authenticity and never attempted to think outside the consensual norm.

Objectively-speaking, it is clear that there are only a handful of places where there is some real originality in the Nuzhah in comparison with Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ’s work. Al-Munāwī identifies only ten sections which feature in the Nuzhah and not in the Muqaddima (1999, 1: pp.32-3). Eight of them simply relate to how we group different names and kunyas (section 5.65.) such as ‘reporters whose teacher’s name coincides with their father’s name’. This can hardly described as pioneering and important. There are only two sections which are truly original, muḥkam (section 5.14.) and the reasons behind the ḥadīth (5.71.). Otherwise, the material, classification and even the examples are similar to the Muqaddima. Only the literary style is perhaps different.

On a wider scale, the fact that there are many similarities between the Nuzhah and the Muqaddima raise a more important question about whether the discipline ever really continuously developed throughout the centuries, or whether it suffered from academic passiveness. A case can be made for the latter, and proof for this can be found in the opinion of Ibn Ḥībbān (d. 354/965), who said: ‘…I see that the [Islamic] disciplines are all developing except this discipline [of ḥadīth]. For this is declining day by day’ (in al-Munāwī 1999, 1: 4). Perhaps Ibn Ḥibbān wanted to highlight that as early as the fourth Islamic century, there was not enough original work being done in ‘ilm al-ḥadīth.
In short, the Nuzhah’s introduction suggests two themes. One suggests that milestone works appeared in the discipline every so often which proved to be the depended guide for scholars and disciples thereafter. Like the Muqaddima, the universal acceptance of the Nuzhah suggests this too received such an accolade. The fact that esteemed scholars such as al-Ālūsī (d. 1342/1923) and al-Qārī (d. 1014/1605) have written commentaries on the Nuzhah is undoubtedly a testimony to its acceptance and appeal. The other theme suggests that the discipline largely depended on the endeavours of the early scholars; thereafter there were modifications and slight alterations throughout the centuries. This reached a terminal end with the Nuzhah.

Only a critical analysis of the Nuzhah will identify which of these two opinions is closer to the truth. Therefore it is a theme which will be touched upon – where possible – throughout the thesis.
5.0. The Main Section; a Translation of the Nuzhah, with the Commentary and Critical Analysis.

5.1. The Author’s Introduction.\(^{34}\)

The author’s introduction has been translated (in bold) and analysed in the previous section (4.0) and therefore it has not been duplicated here.

5.2. Khabar al-aḥād and mutāwatir; The division of traditions according to how they reached us.

The khabar – according to the scholars of this field – is synonymous with [the meaning of] ḥadīth. It is said ḥadīth is that which derives from the Prophet ﷺ, and khabar is that which derives from others. Furthermore, it is said to a person who occupies himself with history and similar [disciplines] ‘al-akhbār’, and a person who occupies himself with ḥadīth ‘muḥaddith’.\(^{35}\) It is [also] said that the difference between them is ‘umūm wa-khaṣṣaṣ mutlaq \(^{36}\); thus every ḥadīth is a khabar, and not vice versa. It has been described here with khabar to be more encompassing.

\(^{35}\) To clarify the general usage of the two terms, Ibn Ḥajar writes that a person who occupies himself with the study of history and similar subjects is called an akhbār and not a muḥaddith. Likewise, a person who occupies himself with the study of the Prophetic sunna is called a muḥaddith, and not an akhbār.

\(^{36}\) This terminology is derived from uṣūl al-fiqh (principles of jurisprudence) and refers to when two things are related through generality and particularity. For example, ‘every football is round, but not every round object is a football’ and ‘every Messenger (rasūl) is a prophet (nabī), but not every Prophet is a Messenger. The other type is ‘umūm wa-khaṣṣaṣ wajhī. This refers to a general statement from which some part has been made particular. For instance, the Prophet said ‘there is no Prayer after ʿAṣr until the sun disappears.’
So according to consideration of how it reached us, the khabar either has ṭariqs, namely many chains; because the plural of ṭariq is ṭuruq. The word [on the template] of fa‘īl pluralises on fu‘ul for kathra – with two ḍammās – and af‘īla for qilla. And what is meant by ‘ṭariqs’ is chains [Isnāds]. The isnād is the report of the path leading to the matn. The matn is the final text at which the chain finishes. And the ‘numerous chains’ is one of the conditions of mutawātir when it appears.

Commentary

In this opening section, Ibn Ḥajar sets up the discussion for the forthcoming analysis on mutawātir. He begins with the definitions of oft-used technical terms which he employs throughout the book, namely khabar, ḥadīth, ṭariq, Isnād and matn. Owing to the dispute surrounding its definition, he offers three definitions for khabar, of which he prefers the first. Interestingly, Ibn Ḥajar opts for a more detailed analysis of the word ṭariq by providing information about what its plural is too. The reason for the in-depth analysis of this (Ṣaḥīh al-Bukhārī, ḥadīth no. 551; Book, the Times of Salāh; Chapter, Prayer is not performed before the sun sets.) Here, ‘there is no Prayer’ is general and ‘after ‘‘Asr’’ is particular (al-‘Uthaymin 2002, p. 37). ṭariq (pl. ṭuruq). Ibn Ḥajar writes that the plural for a word on the template of fa‘īl falls under two possibilities- fu‘ul if it is jam‘ kathra and af‘īla if it is jam‘ qilla. The literal meaning of ṭariq is path, but here it refers to the chains of narration, or Isnād.

The intended dialogue and text.

37 i. Khabar means the same as ḥadīth, an opinion which al-Kaṣīf al-Baghdādī inclines to (1988, 16). In other words, it is a narration ascribed to the Prophet, regardless of whether this narration describes the words, actions or silent approvals of the Prophet. Commentators assert that this is the position which Ibn Ḥajar himself adheres to (al-‘Uthaymin 2002, 36). The reason for this is that the latter two opinions are cited using the word qīla (‘it is said’), thus giving the indication that they are weaker opinions.

ii. Whatever originates from the Prophet is called ḥadīth, and that which comes from others (such as the Companions) is called khabar. Under this position, it is not permissible refer to the sayings of the Companions or those after them using the word ḥadīth’, except with further clarity. In other words, we would be required to say ḥadīth mawqūf, rather than just ḥadīth, when referring to the sayings of the Companions (al-Munāwī 1999, 1: 228).

iii. The third opinion cited is that the terms ḥadīth and khabar are related to one another through ‘umūm wa-khasiṣ mutlaq. On this basis, a saying that stems from the Prophet can equally be referred to as a ḥadīth or khabar, but a narration stemming from a Companion can only be referred to as a khabar.
particular word is that the number of chains is the fundamental difference between the first two types of reports he discusses in the Nuzhah. If the narration reaches us through numerous chains\(^{40}\), then it is classified as mutawātir. If there are limited chains, then it is khabar al-āḥād.

A few points are important to clarify regarding this opening section from Ibn Ḥajar:

i. He only provides such detailed, linguistic analysis in the early parts of the Nuzhah. As the work progresses, less and less emphasis is given to the linguistic aspects of technical terms. This is not inconsistency on his part; rather it makes sense to provide a detailed definition for oft-used terms early on, which then creates ease for the reader for the rest of the book. Additionally, providing such detail does indicate that the target-audience of the Nuzhah was disciples embarking on ḥadīth studies for the first time, rather than the experts.

ii. Ibn Ḥajar commences the Nuzhah with the term khabar rather than ḥadīth. This seems incorrect as the discipline is known as ‘ilm al-ḥadīth rather than ‘ilm al-khabar. He pre-empts this possible objection and therefore answers it himself. He writes that the word khabar is generally accepted to be more encompassing in referring to the traditions of the Prophet and others such as the Companions.\(^{41}\) This indicates that he sees the study of \(^{40}\) Sanad, or insād (pl. asānīd). According to most ḥadīth scholars, the word sanad and insād are synonymous. Ṭaḥṭān notes that insād can mean ascribing a tradition to its origin through a chain, or it means exactly the same as sanad (2001, pp.13-14).

\(^{41}\) The literal meaning of ḥadīth is ‘new’. The traditions of the Prophet are thus called to contrast it with the Qur’ān, which is considered as gādīm (al-Ṣuyūṭī 1972, 42 & Khalīfa 1983, 26). We find that the Prophet himself explicitly used the word ḥadīth or its derivatives to refer to his own sayings. For instance; (i) ‘Report from Banī Isrā‘īl and there is no hindrance. Report (haddith) from me and do not lie (Musnad Ahmad, ḥadīth no. 11111; Book, The chains of the remaining oft-narrators; Chapter, The Musnad of Abū Sa‘īd al-Khudrī.) (ii) In a report narrated by Abū Hurayra, the Prophet said: ‘Shall I not report to you a ḥadīth about Dāji‘a…’(Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī, Book; the Reports of the Prophets, Chapter, the Saying of Allāh, ‘Verily We sent Nūh to his people,’ ḥadīth no. 3090). Azami notes that the word ‘ḥadīth’ has been used twenty-three times in the Qur’ān (1977, 1). traditions as not just limited to the words and actions of the Prophet; it can refer to others too.

iii. Related to the above point is the fact that he chose not to define sunna here in the early part of the Nuzhah. Rather, he elaborates on this term much later on in the book (section 5.40). This could be because he wanted to begin with the relatively easier terms such as ḥadīth and refer to the more complex terms such as sunna later on. Alternatively, the reason could be because he viewed ḥadīth and sunna as two, entirely separate things. If this is the case, then his view is not dissimilar to the view of non-Muslim scholars on the issue. Schacht, for example, has suggested that the word sunna was a source of confusion amongst early Muslims. He writes that the likes of Mālik ibn Anas understood ‘sunna’ to mean the ‘living tradition’ of the community, rather than a term specific to the actions and sayings of the Prophet (1959, 62). More will be said about this in section 5.40, once we have identified what Ibn Ḥajar’s stance actually is on the term sunna.

iv. In his introduction, Ibn Ḥajar declared that the Nuzhah would be presented in a ‘rare style’. This is perhaps referring to the sequence adopted by him in presenting the different types of prophetic reports and their classification. What we notice is that the choice to begin with mutawātir differs with the scholars prior and just after him. For instance:

a. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ began his Muqaddima with the division of prophetic reports according to its authenticity, thus categorising them into ṣaḥīh, ḥasan and ḍaʿīf (1986, pp. 11-41).

b. Al-Mayyānishī began with an introduction on the importance and superiority of reporting prophetic reports, after which he outlined the different words used to relate them, such as akhbaranā (Librande 1982, 42).
c. Ibn Ḥajar’s own teacher al-‘Irāqī commenced with the division of reports into ṣahīḥ, ḥasan and daʿīf (1995, 7).

d. Al-Suyūtī too began with the division of reports into ṣahīḥ, ḥasan and daʿīf (1972, 62)

Ibn Ḥajar’s choice to begin with mutawātir could be due to three reasons. Firstly, as he points out in the next section, mutawātir is not technically part of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. Hence, he felt the need to define it at the beginning, and then dedicate the rest of the book to what is widely understood to be the field of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. Secondly, a plausible reason may be that he felt the need to commence with the strongest type of tradition, which is mutawātir. From the onset, Ibn Ḥajar wanted to alert the reader to the strong and authentic nature of ḥadīth material. Therefore it made sense to discuss mutawātir first. Finally, Ibn Ḥajar perhaps wanted to adopt a ‘rare style’ for the sake of it. If it could be shown that the Nuzhah has largely repeated what fellow Muslim scholars have written in their works on ‘ilm al-ḥadīth prior to him, then this certainly would support this opinion. Whether this is true or not will be highlighted throughout section five.

From this short, introductory section from the Nuzhah, we can at least begin to gain an insight into Ibn Ḥajar’s intentions and the character of the Nuzhah. By defining the oft-repeated terms used in the field early on, he shows good literary skills and identifies his potential target audience. By choosing to refer to mutawātir first (and not ṣahīḥ, ḥasan and daʿīf), Ibn Ḥajar may be expressing originality for the sake of it. Alternatively, he could be making a statement of bold intent: to present a truly original and ground-breaking treatise in ‘ilm al-ḥadīth.

42 He writes: ‘And the conditions of mutawātir have not been mentioned in the original [text of the Nukhbah], because on this basis, it is not part of the discussions of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth.’
5.3. Mutawātir.

[Either the khabar has many paths but] without a specified number; rather, experience makes it impossible for them to collude on a lie. Additionally [it is impossible] to occur coincidentally [and] unintentionally. According to the correct [position], there is no requirement in specifying the number. Amongst them are those who have specified four\(^{43}\) [as the minimum number of reporters required in each generation]; though five\(^{44}\), seven\(^{45}\), ten\(^{46}\), twelve\(^{47}\), forty\(^{48}\), seventy\(^{49}\) and other figures have [also] been mentioned. Every advocate has held to some evidence that mentions that number, and thus gives knowledge. It is not necessary to repel other [opinions], due to the possibility of specification.\(^{50}\) Hence, when the khabar is mentioned as such and this is coupled with the aforementioned number manifesting itself from the beginning to the end – and what is meant by this is that the aforementioned number does not lessen in some places, not that it increases, since an increase is desired by all means – and that the end information is a witnessed or \(^{43}\) A minimum of four transmitters; this is on the basis that at least four witnesses are required to prosecute an adulterer (Anwar 2003, 36).

\(^{44}\) A minimum of five transmitters; when a husband accuses his wife of adultery but has no credible evidence, then the Qur’ān outlines a procedure known as li’ān. Because the husband curses the wife on the fifth attempt, some scholars accept that the minimum amount should be five (Qur’ān, 24: 7-9).

\(^{45}\) A minimum of seven transmitters; this is on the basis that this is the number of days in a week, as well as the number of heavens.

\(^{46}\) A minimum of ten transmitters; in Arabic grammar, this is the minimum number of jam’ kathra (the plural of plenitude).

\(^{47}\) A minimum of twelve transmitters; in the Qur’ān, Moses delegated twelve representatives for his meeting with Allāh (Qur’ān, 7: 160).

\(^{48}\) A minimum of forty transmitters; this is on the basis that when the verse ‘O Prophet! Sufficient for you is Allāh and those who follow you from the believers’ (Qur’ān, 8: 64), the number of the Prophet’s followers were forty.

\(^{49}\) A minimum of seventy transmitters; again, this has its roots from the Qur’ān (7: 155). Moses chose seventy people from his community for the place of meeting (Anwar 2003, 37).

\(^{50}\) Ibn Hajar also suggests that other suggestions should not be ruled out, as this will lead to an objective definition of mutawātir. If, for instance, twelve were to be defined as the universal minimum number, a ḥadīth may be found that has this number in each generation, but still does not give the benefit of knowledge.
heard matter and not something proven by mere conjecture; thus when these four conditions are found – and they are a large number which makes it impossible for them to have colluded on a lie or coincidentally agreed on a lie; they narrate it from their likes from the beginning to the end; the last person witnessed the matter, and that their khabar gives the benefit of knowledge to its listener – then this is mutawātir. Anything that is short of giving the benefit of knowledge is mashhūr only. So every mutawātir is mashhūr, and not vice versa. It is said that when the four conditions are achieved it necessitates the attaining of knowledge. This is the case mostly, but it does not sometimes due to a hindrance. And by this, the definition of mutawātir is clear. The opposite [of mutawātir] sometimes appears with indefinite numbers too, but with the absence of other conditions.

[The khabar reaches us with numerous isnāds] or reaches us with a limit, of more than two; namely three or more, so long as it does not fulfill the conditions of mutawātir; or [it reaches us] with two only, or one only. What is meant by our saying ‘that it reaches us with two’ is that less than two is not found. Thus, if it appears with more than two in some places in one chain, it does not harm [it], since the minimum is considered in this field over the maximum. So the first is mutawātir with its conditions. This gives the benefit of certain knowledge (‘ilm al-yaqīn). [By mentioning this], this excludes controvertible knowledge (‘ilm al-nazar), which will soon be explained. And ‘yaqīn’ is strong belief corresponding [to the truth]. This is the trusted opinion; that khabar mutawātir gives the benefit of definitive knowledge. This [knowledge] forces a person to accept it in such a way it is not possible to refute. It has also been said that [mutawātir] does not give knowledge except controvertible knowledge. This is not so. The reason is that knowledge via mutawātīr is achieved by him who does not have the ability of contemplation (nāzar), like a layperson.

‘Contemplation’ (nāzar) requires the ordering of known or presumed facts, leading to [further] facts or presumptions. A layperson does not have the ability to do that. Thus, if [the result of mutawātīr] were controvertible knowledge, it would not be achieved for them. With this discussion, the difference between definitive knowledge and controvertible knowledge is clear; definitive knowledge gives benefit without evidence-building and controvertible knowledge gives benefit but with evidence-building. And controvertible knowledge can only be attained by the one who has the ability to contemplate.

The conditions of mutawātīr have not been mentioned in the original [text of the Nukhbah], because on this basis, it is not part of the discussions of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth, since ‘ilm al-isnād involves the investigation of the authenticity and weakness of the ḥadīth so it can be acted upon or discarded, in terms of the attributes of the narrators and the words of delivery. And the narrators are not investigated in mutawātīr, but rather it is compulsory to act upon it without investigation.

Note: Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ has mentioned that the examples of mutawātīr – based upon the aforementioned definition – are rare in existence, apart from what he claims for, ‘Whoever deliberately ascribes a lie to me, let him find a seat for himself in hell.’ What he has claimed of its rarity is unfound, as is the claim of other [scholars] who say that there are no mutawātīr at all. This is because [these opinions] stemmed from a lack of awareness of the excessive number of chains, the states of the narrators and the [other] characteristics required to repel experience from allowing them to collude on a lie, or for them to narrate the same coincidentally. The best explanation for proving the significant existence of such reports is that the famous, widespread books in the hands of the people of knowledge, east and west, that are definitively proven to be ascribed to their compilers, when these compilers agree on recording a ḥadīth, and their isnāds are sufficient to allow the impossibility of colluding on a lie, along with the other conditions, this gives definitive knowledge of correctly ascribing it to its speaker. Such examples in the famous books are plentiful.

Commentary

Ibn Ḥajar offers his definition of mutawātir (the multiply-attested), which literally means ‘widespread’.\(^{51}\) Four principal conditions of mutawātir are identified. Firstly, the number of transmitters forms the primary element of a mutawātir ḥadīth – that the tradition must be reported by such a large number that realistically speaking, it would have been impossible for all the transmitters to have colluded on a lie, or that they all coincidentally happened to narrate the tradition correctly. However, this actual number is left ambiguous and subjective, as Ibn Ḥajar offers no definitive opinion on how many transmitters must appear in each generation for the tradition to be labelled as mutawātir. Rather he cites different opinions on the matter.

Secondly and importantly, this ‘large number’ must be found in all generations. If a particular tradition is reported by dozens of Companions, only to be reported by two or three in the generation of Successors (tābiʿūn), the ḥadīth will not be classified as mutawātir. From the beginning to the end of the chain, the numbers must be maintained.

\(^{51}\) This word is derived from tawāṭara, meaning to be continuous or torrential (Ṭaḥān 2001, 17).
Thirdly, the last person must have seen or heard the event (hiss) and the information in the report should not be mere conjecture or guesswork. Finally, the ḥadīth gives the listener the benefit of knowledge.

Ibn Ḥajar does provide additional information which is related to mutawātir. In detail, he refers to the difference between definitive (al-‘ilm al-yaqīnī, also called al-‘ilm al-ḍarūrī and al-‘ilm al-qāṭī) and controvertible knowledge (al-‘ilm al-naẓārī) and how mutawātir gives the benefit of the former. Owing to the strength of a mutawātir ḥadīth, this, he believes, gives definitive knowledge.

5.3.1. Conclusion.

The section on mutawātir is long and extensive, and part of this is because of needless repetition. In full, he mentions the four conditions of mutawātir twice in the above text for no reason whatsoever. It is muddled too sometimes: his discussion on al-‘ilm al-yaqīnī and al-‘ilm al-naẓārī is more suited for an oral audience rather than for a written book, because he ventures into defining yaqīn rather than al-‘ilm al-yaqīnī.

This indicates that the Nuzhah – or at least this section – may have been produced through the students’ notes gained from his lecturing. Ibn Ḥajar was known to employ this method; this was the case with Fath al-bārī. His disciples would record his dictations and soon the works took on the form of a book. Nor was he the first to adopt such a methodology: Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ (d. 643/1245), author of the renowned Ulūm al-ḥadīth, did not aim to write the book per se; the works were put together from his lecturing at al-

52 In other words, the last narrator uses words which suggest he witnessed the event related to the matn. For example, the narrator would use words such as ‘I heard’, or ‘I saw’, and so on (Ṭahṭān 2001, 18; al-Wajīḍī 1996, 29).
Madrasa al-Ashrafiyya. Though dependency on students must have brought many benefits to Ibn Ḥajar – the time he could save, for example – it does expose a compromise in the quality of literary style.

There are other key observations to note from this section on mutawātir:

a. Ibn Ḥajar outlines the different opinions held on how many transmitters need to be found in each generation for a report to be deemed as mutawātir, four, seven, ten, twelve, forty and seventy. It is important to note that none of the aforementioned numbers has any direct link or affiliation with the field of ʿilm al-hadīth. Instead, they are merely numbers that have Islamic importance, mostly because these numbers have been mentioned in the Qurʾān or have other Islamic significance. There may be seven heavens, but this is no valid reason to affirm that the minimum number of transmitters in each generation must also be seven in a mutawātir ḥadīth. This view is further proved by the fact that some Muslim scholars have suggested that each generation should consist of at least three hundred and thirteen transmitters, based on the number of Muslims that fought in the Battle of Badr (Anwar 2003, 37). This is purely hypothetical since no ḥadīth exists with such a high number of transmitters in each generation.

Ibn Ḥajar asserts that a specific number of transmitters in each generation is not required, and this has led to some confusion. Simply stating that a ‘large number’ is required possibly leads to a particular ḥadīth being classified as mutawātir according to one scholar and not another. Al-Munāwī implicitly acknowledges this problem when he writes that:
Know that mutawahār is sometimes relative. So a khabar is mutawahār according to one community and not another (1999, 1: 246).

The fact that the exact number required is left ambiguous means defining mutawahār is a subjective exercise. Moreover, do all scholars agree that mutawahār does not require a specific number? Al-Suyūṭī maintains the generally-held position that ‘there is no consideration for a specific number’, but then later writes that ten ‘is the chosen opinion’ (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 176-177).

To conclude, considering mutawahār is the strongest type of tradition, then it is surprising to see that even by the ninth Islamic century, there was still no clear guideline as to what exactly constitutes a mutawahār ḥadīth.

b. Compared to other Muslim scholars, Ibn Ḥajar does not divide mutawahār into *lafz*ī and ma‘nawi.53 Al-Suyūṭī clearly divides and defines the two:

> Verily, the people of üşūl have divided mutawahār into lafzī – and this is whose wordings are repeated – and ma‘nawī; this is when a group transmit a narration [to such an extent] it is impossible for them to have agreed on a lie, in different ways on a shared matter (1972, 2: 180).

53 If the words of the matn repeat ad verbum in all the narrations, then this is considered as mutawahār lafzī. If the same meaning is found in all the narrations – though the actual wording differs from report to report – then this is mutawahār ma‘nawi.
Had Ibn Ḥajar done so, then he would not have the need to criticise Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ for suggesting that ‘Whoever deliberately ascribes a lie to me, let him find a seat for himself in hell’ is the only mutawātir ḥadīth, adding that such an opinion stems ‘from a lack of awareness…’

It seems Ibn Ḥajar may have simply misunderstood Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ’s statement. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ was referring to mutawātir lafżī, not maʾnawī. And undoubtedly, most scholars are severely strained in producing a mutawātir lafżī ḥadīth, other than ‘Whoever deliberately ascribes a lie to me, let him find a seat for himself in hell.’ In conclusion, Ibn Ḥajar assumed that Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ denied the existence of mutawātir maʾnawī, when in fact he questioned the existence of mutawātir lafżī.

Regardless of this, Ibn Ḥajar – and indeed other ḥadīth scholars – all agree that mutawātir are very few in number. Ad verbum, there is only one mutawātir report and the maʾnawī are hardly excessive in number.⁵⁴ Though mutawātir is undoubtedly strong in terms of authenticity for the Muslims, the almost non-existence of it means it is irrelevant. This may raise questions about the field of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth as a whole, something which Sayyid Aḥmad Khān certainly asked. Khān, a close admirer of Muir, rejected the authenticity of almost all prophetic reports and deemed only mutawātir as worthy of acceptance, which he counted as five (Brown 1999, 34).

c. Ibn Ḥajar makes no mention of the matn with regards to mutawātīr. This suggests that he saw the soundness of a ḥadīth largely dependent on the isnād alone. Moreover, Ibn Ḥajar writes that with mutawātīr, there is no need to investigate the isnād either. ‘Ilm al-ḥadīth is widely defined as the study of the literature of the Prophet by analysing the text and chain in order to evaluate its authenticity. Ibn Ḥajar argues that since mutawātīr are universally accepted, and additional research into the chain is not required, it is not technically ‘part of the discussion of ‘ilm al-hadīth.’ The often difficult and long-winded analysis required for other types of ḥadīth – ṣaḥīḥ, ḥasan and daʿīf for instance – is not required as all mutawātīr are accepted unequivocally. In fact, in this section, Ibn Ḥajar actually refers to the discipline as ‘ilm al-isnād, rather than ‘ilm al-hadīth, which clearly indicates the importance of the isnād in his view.

However, other Muslim scholars do not agree. Al-Munāwī implicitly suggests that the exact nature of the transmitters can make a difference. When discussing the issue of the requirement of the large number to be found in each generation, he writes:

Seven credible narrators – outwardly and inwardly – are like ten narrators who are [only] outwardly credible…sometimes seven pious learned people give the benefit of knowledge, whereas ten non-pious people do not. So what is meant is equality in the [benefit of] knowledge, not equality in numbers (1999, 1: 244).

Thus this gives some weight to the opinion that not all mutawātīr are readily-accepted and that, like with other types of prophetic reports, mutawātīr does require further analysis.
d. Fourthly, Ibn Ḥajar spends considerable effort in explaining that mutawātir gives the benefit of al-ʿilm al-yaqīnī, which thus adds to its credibility. Surely, if mutawātir gives the benefit of definitive knowledge, then it would be necessary to act upon it without question. Al-Suyūṭī asserts that ‘it is compulsory to act upon mutawātir’ (1972, 2: 176). But one can argue that not all mutawātir are acted upon (maʿmul bihi). Ẓahhrîn cites the raising of the hands in Prayer as mutawātir, but it is not universally acted upon. Fifty Companions have transmitted this ḥadīth, but Abū Ḥanīfa does not adhere to the position. He argues that the practice of raising the hands in Prayer – despite narrations on the matter being mutawātir – is abrogated (2001, 13). Mutawātir may give the benefit of definitive knowledge, but this does not guarantee it is acted upon.

On a wider scale, this suggests that Ibn Ḥajar was primarily focussing on ‘ilm al-ḥadīth in the Nuzhah, to the exclusion of fiqh. This is because he does not refer to how a mutawātir report would manifest itself in the field of sharīʿa, when it came to being acted or not acted upon. He was only interested in how this report relates to ʿilm al-ḥadīth.

e. Despite these points, there is one very important matter derived from the author’s explanation on mutawātir here. The text most worthy of attention in Ibn Ḥajar’s Nuzhah is where he remarks:

> And the best explanation for proving the significant existence of such [multiply-attested] reports is that the famous, widespread books in the hands of the people of knowledge, east and west, that are definitively proven to be ascribed to their authors, when they agree on recording a ḥadīth, and their chains are plentiful to allow the impossibility of colluding on a lie, along with the other conditions, this gives definitive knowledge of correctly ascribing it to its speaker. And examples of that in the famous books are plentiful.

Ibn Ḥajar’s argument here is that geography actually helps to prove the authenticity of traditions, not disprove them. In an age lacking fast and effective communication methods, the only way a reporter in Kūfa could have agreed with a reporter in Madina was if they had both heard an authentic report, stemming from the Prophet. Practically, it would have been all but impossible for them to have colluded on a lie from such a distance.

This argument is crucial for one particular reason: it is precisely this point that modern, Muslim scholars have used to defend the authenticity of ḥadīth literature against non-Muslim scholars. Muslims such as Azami argue that the geographical disparity of the reporters seriously question whether large-scale collusion could have occurred, not just for one report but for thousands. This is exactly what Ibn Ḥajar advocates here in the Nuzhah. For instance, the ḥadīth commanding Muslims to wash their hands thrice when they awake consists of thirteen students reporting from Abū Hurayra, of which eight come from Madina, one from Kūfa, two from Basra, one from Yemen and one from Syria. In the next generation of reporters, the reporters spread to Khurāsan and Makka, in addition to the aforementioned places (Azami 1977, 34).

Ibn Ḥajar argues that certain traditions have been so widely reported – albeit with slightly different wording – that one cannot imagine the possibility of all transmitters colluding on a lie. Hence, such traditions are classified as mutawātir.
In short, the Nuzhah has helped modern Muslim scholars to convince the sceptics about the early hadith literature with what they see as a very strong argument: that geography proves the impossibility of collusion. Azami writes:

> To claim that hundreds of thousands of scholars spent their lives making forgeries in collusion and provided this literature with all biographical details is to show an utter disregard for human nature (Azami 1992, 92).

But there is one point that Azami and other Muslim scholars have ignored. In the text of the Nuzhah, Ibn Ḥajar suggests that one prophetic report found in the various ‘famous, widespread books in the hands of the people of knowledge’ is proof that the report cannot be forged. Most of these books that Ibn Ḥajar was referring to were compiled in the third and fourth century. By then, the fabrication and collusion, as depicted by Schacht, had already taken place and the compilers such as al-Bukhārī were merely compiling these reports by the time they appeared, and not verifying them. So though it seems like a strong argument to the likes of Azami, it is quickly dismissed by non-Muslim scholars because the efforts of al-Bukhārī and others came too late.

Therefore a contrasting view from the Muslim scholars on the one hand and the non-Muslim ones on the other is apparent. This gulf is epitomised perfectly with the one and only mutawātir lafzī that the likes of Ibn Ḥajar refer to: ‘Whoever deliberately ascribes a lie to me, let him find a seat for himself in hell.’ For the Muslims, this report is undoubtedly sound in terms of authenticity. For non-Muslims, it is forged (Goldziher 1971, 127).
To conclude, Ibn Ḥajar’s decision to begin his Nuzhah with mutawātīr was owing to its importance and position. But we should also entertain another possibility, which would enable us to comprehend the importance of mutawātīr in the ninth Islamic century. The purpose of mutawātīr is not only to display that some reports were transmitted in a rigid and fool-proof manner throughout the early period of Islam. It had another purpose; to appeal to the Muslims of later times to participate in religious studies en masse (Graham 1993, 501). After all, this is the only method by which a report reaches such a lofty height of mutawātīr.

The second – and this is the first division of al-aḥād – is that which has limited chains but more than two. This is mashhūr, according to the ḥadīth scholars. It is so called because of its apparentness. This is [also called] mustafīd based upon the opinion of a group of the imāms of the jurists. It is thus called because of its dispersion, from [the verb] fāḍa al-mā’ yafūd fayḍ. There are some who have differentiated between mustafīd and mashhūr; that mustafīd is where the beginning and ending are equal, and mashhūr is more general than that. Then there are some [scholars] who have differentiated them upon another basis; and this is not part of discussions of this field [of knowledge]. Then, mashhūr is the name given to what we have explained, and upon what is famous on the tongues. Thus, this [latter type]

55 This other basis, al-Qārī notes, is defining mustafīd as a report which the people accept without looking at how many people have reported it in each generation. Therefore, there is no difference between mustafīd and mutawātīr (1994, 194). And because Ibn Ḥajar believes that mutawātīr is not technically part of ʾilm al-ḥadīth, he writes here that ‘this is not from the discussions from this field [of knowledge]. can consist of that which has one isnād or more; in fact [it can refer to] that which does not have an isnād at all.

Commentary

5.4.1. The division of khabar al-āḥād - mashhūr.

In terms of sequence and arrangement, this section corresponds well with the previous one on mutawātir. Ibn Ḥajar explained earlier that any ḥadīth which does not reach the stage of mutawātir is called āḥād. The first type of this is mashhūr, which he defines as a ḥadīth which has more than two narrators in each generation. He also entertains the term mustafīd, which he indicates is used by the jurists. However, he does not elaborate on this much. There could be two reasons for this. Firstly, it is because mustafīd is a term used by the jurists and he wants to concentrate on terms used by the ḥadīth scholars. Secondly, it could be due to the fact that, quite simply, mustafīd hardly exists and hardly matters.
Mustafīd is where the same number of narrators is to be found at the beginning and end of the chain, mashhūr is where the number may vary. No ḥadīth scholar has cited such an example of mustafīd, Ibn Ḥajar or others before and after him. Even if it did exist, then the fact that the same number of narrators is to be found at the beginning and the end does not in any way strengthen the report, particularly if there is a drop in the number in the middle of the isnād. This leads to the question as to whether there is any function of the term mustafīd.

Nevertheless, Ibn Ḥajar’s section here on mashhūr is concise yet very clear. In a simple section, the reader is able to understand that the term mashhūr has two types: the terminological type and the non-terminological type. As for the former, this is where in each generation there are more than two narrators (and does not reach the stage of mutawātir). The latter is where the ḥadīth is considered ‘famous’, regardless of how many narrators are to be found in each part of the chain. For instance, the ḥadīth ‘actions are judged according to intention’ can be referred to as mashhūr in the sense it is famous and known amongst the Muslims. But in terms of formal ḥadīth terminology, it is gharīb. In fact, a ḥadīth can be classified as mashhūr in this sense if it only has one narrator, or does not even possess a chain and is thus fabricated. Al-Suyūṭī several traditions that he says are famous, but have no authentic basis such as ‘Whoever knows himself, knows his Lord’ and the ḥadīth qudsī ‘I was an unknown treasure…’ (1972, 2: 176). The fact that Ibn Ḥajar adds the words ‘according to the ḥadīth scholars’ after defining the technical term shows that he wants the reader to understand that this is not to be confused with non-technical term.

Importantly, this clear difference between the two types of mashhūr is missing from Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ’s Muqaddima. In a long analysis of mashhūr, he dismisses the terminological definition entirely and only focuses on reports that are famous amongst the Muslims in general, or a particular group of Muslims like the jurists and the linguists (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, pp. 265-269). The clarity of Ibn Ḥajar’s explanation is perhaps best reflected by the fact that after him, al-Suyūṭī repeated the Nuzhah’s section on mashhūr almost in its entirety in his own Tadrīb. (1972, 2: 173).

56 Other examples of traditions, as al-Suyūṭī points out are: (i) ‘Verily Allāh does not retract knowledge, he retracts it from the death of the scholars….’ This tradition is classified as ṣaḥīḥ, in formal ʿilm al-ḥadīth terminology, and mashhūr too, because it is a famous and widely-known report. (ii) ‘The seeking of knowledge is compulsory for every Muslim.’ This is mashhūr in the sense of being famous, and ḥasan in ʿilm al-ḥadīth classification (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 174).
Ibn Ḥajar’s section on mashhūr therefore highlights his skill as a writer and as a ḥadīth scholar. He presents the section in the correct place in terms of sequence. He identifies the term clearly and alerts the reader of its other usage. Though the section does without a practical example of mashhūr, it is still sufficient; Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ mentions several examples in his section yet it is still unconvincing.

To conclude this section, there are two points to raise.

a. Though Ibn Ḥajar differentiated between the two types of mashhūr in meaning, he does not do so in terms of technical terms. In order to prevent confusion, it would have been useful to lend separate names for the technical and the non-technical type. The only Muslim scholar to do this is Ṭaḥhān, who uses the terms mashhūr īstilāḥī and mashhūr ghayr-īstilāḥī (2001, 20-21).

The opposite has seemed to happen with the term mustafīḍ: that a term has been coined for a type of report which is rare to find practically and serves little function.

b. The second point relates to non-Muslim interest in the discipline. Schacht was of the opinion that al-Shāfi‘ī was the first jurist to identify the term ‘sunna’ with the Prophet, and that prior to this, Muslims associated the term with the ‘living tradition’ of the community (1959, 80). In some sense, the non-terminological type of mashhūr has some overlap with this opinion. This is because this type of report shows how influential the opinion of the community can actually be, in that they can assume a saying to be from the Prophet when in fact it is not. Ibn Ḥajar’s own disciple al-Sakhāwī wrote al-Maqāṣid al-ḥasanā, a large work listing all the prophetic reports that are well-known amongst Muslims.57 There are many reports in this book that are famous, but have not been proven to be the words of the Prophet. In the same way, one could argue that certain practices prevailed in the Arab community which people automatically assumed to be the sunna of the Prophet, when in fact they were not. Schacht certainly seems to suggest that this is the case with many pre-Islamic and post-Muḥammad practices, like mutʿa for example (1959, 266). He also wrote that Mālik ibn Anas preferred common practice to traditions stemming from the Prophet (1959, 64). For Muslims, the implication of this argument is that many of the legal practices they know today are more ‘Arab’ than they are ‘Islamic’.

The works of non-Muslim scholars is crucial in adding to the understanding of the discipline and adds another layer that is lacking in Muslim works. Plenty of examples are offered of the non-technical mashhūr by the Muslim scholars. Yet, nowhere do we find a discussion of a more pressing concern: how did prophetic reports become famous and dispersed amongst the Muslims whereas in reality, they were forged and fabricated? Mīghālwaṭī cites the tradition ‘whoever smells a rose and does not send salutations upon me, then he has disowned me’ (2003, 345). He admits it is most probably forged. Yet he does not elaborate on why this tradition reached a stage where it was assumed by the Muslims to have stemmed from the Prophet.

This is where the works of Schacht add an important dimension. By arguing that the term sunna may have simply meant the living tradition of the community and not particular to the example of the Prophet, we can now begin to appreciate how certain traditions may have become subject to confusion regarding its true source, the community or the Prophet.

Thus, the work of non-Muslim scholars is important, even in understanding the Nuzhah of Ibn Ḥajar. Sometimes, their opinions are not totally different from that of the Muslims (as it has been shown here), and therefore they are possible to accommodate. This shows that Oriental studies can be of worth to Muslims, if they overcome the stereotype they hold that all western interest in ḥadīth is negative. They add a level of analysis which is so lacking in Muslim works, even today.

5.5. ‘Azīz.

The third is ‘azīz. This is where a minimum of two reporters narrate from two others. It is so called either because of its rare existence, or because it strengthens; in other words it strengthens with its appearance via another path.58 ‘Azīz is not a condition for the ṣaḥīḥ, as opposed to whoever assumes so. This is Abū ʿAlī al-Jubbāʾī of the Muʿtazila. The writings of al-Ḥākim Abū ʿAbd Allāh also indicate this opinion when he states: ‘The ṣaḥīḥ is that which is narrated by a Companion void of ambiguity who then narrates it to two; then the people of ḥadīth circulate it until our time, like the testimony upon the testimony.’ Also, al-Qāḍī Abū Bakr ibn al-ʿArabī has clarified in the commentary of Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī that this was the condition of al-Bukhārī.

In response to the argument presented to them, they offer a contentious answer. This is because they said, if it is said the ḥadīth ‘actions are judged by intentions’ is fard59 [as] no one narrated it from ʿUmar except ʿAlqama, we say that ʿUmar narrated it on the pulpit in the presence of the Companions. If the Companions did not know of it, they would have surely questioned it; this is what they have said.

58 As Ṭahhān explains, the word ‘azīz in Arabic has two meanings; ‘to be rare’ or ‘to be strong.’ If the former meaning is taken here, then the ḥadīth is so called because very rarely are such traditions to be found. Under the latter meaning, the ḥadīth is so called because it strengthens in terms of authenticity when it is supported by another chain (2001, 22).

This is followed up with [the response] that the silence [of the Companions] does not necessitate that they could not have heard it from someone else. [Moreover], though the argument can be accepted in [the case of] ‘Umar, it cannot be accepted in the singularity of ‘Alqama from him. Then Muḥammad ibn Ibrāhīm was solitary from ‘Alqama. Then Yaḥyā ibn Sa‘īd was solitary from Muḥammad, based upon the authentic, known [path] from the ḥadīth masters. Yes, supporting chains have appeared but they cannot be considered. Likewise we do not accept in the answer in other than the ḥadīth of ‘Umar. Ibn Rushayd states that it is sufficient to refute the claim of al-Qāḍī Abū Bakr (that it is a condition of al-Bukhārī) that this is the first ḥadīth of al-Bukhārī mentioned in his Ṣaḥīḥ.

Ibn Ḥibbān has made the opposite of this claim. He said that the narration of two from two to its end cannot be found at all. I say, if he intends the narration of two only from two only cannot be found at all, then it is possible to accept. As for the form of ‘azīz that we have explained, thus it is present: that less than two do not narrate from two. Its example is that which the two Shaykhs have narrated from Anas – and al-Bukhārī from Abū Hurayra – that the Prophet said: ‘No one is a [true] believer until I become more beloved to him than his father, his son…[to the end of] the ḥadīth. From Anas, Qatāda and ‘Abd al-‘Azīz ibn Ṣuhayb have narrated it. Shu‘ba and Sa‘īd have narrated it from Qatāda. And Ismā‘īl ibn ‘Ulayya and ‘Abd al-Wārith have narrated it from ‘Abd al-‘Azīz. Then a group have narrated it from each one [of them].
Commentary

In the section on the second type of khabar al-āḥād – ‘azīz – Ibn Ḥajar covers a variety of different issues.

a. To commence, he offers a definition of ‘azīz, along with the possible origins of the name. In ʿilm al-ḥadīth terminology, he writes that the definition of ‘azīz is when at least two reporters narrate the ḥadīth in each generation. Implicitly, this is a criticism of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ. He writes:

> We heard that the expert Abū ʿAbd Allāh ibn Manda al-Iṣbahānī said: ‘The rare [gharīb] is like those of al-Zuhrī, Qatāda and the other authorities whose ḥadīth are collected. When a single transmitter is alone in relating a particular ḥadīth from them, it is called ‘rare’ [gharīb]. When two or three transmitters relate from them and they all have a single ḥadīth, it is called ‘scarce’ [ʿazīz] (1986, 270).

However, very few scholars have voiced this same opinion and certainly Ibn Ḥajar does not agree. If this definition of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ is accepted, then in some cases, there would be no difference between ‘azīz and mashhūr, since the latter is accepted as the existence of at least three reporters in each generation. In the previous section, it was noted that Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ’s analysis of mashhūr concentrated on the non-terminological type entirely (1986, pp. 265-269). Here, we observe that his definition of ‘azīz indicates that he does not acknowledge that terminological type of mashhūr at all, since the term ‘azīz covers both.
b. The bulk of the section then refers to a debate that preceded the author; the argument as to whether a ḥadīth has to be at least ‘azīz to be deemed as saḥīḥ. He cites the scholars who believe that it does have to be at least ‘azīz, Abū ‘Alī al-Jubbā’i (d. 303/915) of the Mu'tazilites, al-Ḥākim Abū ‘Abd Allāh and al-Qādī Abū Bakr ibn al-‘Arabī (d. 543/1148). Then in detail, he explains why this opinion is not correct, citing the ḥadīth ‘Actions are judged according to intentions’ as proof.

c. Ibn Ḥajar also felt the need to supplement the definition of ‘azīz with the form it can take on. The reason for doing so is to refute the opinion of Ibn Ḥibbān, who wrote that no ‘azīz ḥadīth exists, namely two narrators in each generation. In reality, however, Ibn Ḥajar clarifies that ‘azīz is where a minimum of two are to be found in each generation, not that exactly two are found in each part of the chain. Then as evidence, he cites a prophetic report from al-Bukhārī’s Sahīḥ, along with the names of the reporters in the first two generations.

60 According to the Mu'tazila, a khabar is not accepted until it is reported by at least four narrators in each generation (Anwar 2003, 43). Al-Nawawi heard from the Qadariyya sect that they too only accept a ḥadīth when it is narrated by at least four narrators in each generation (al-Munawwī 1999, 1: 283).

61 Ibn Ḥajar explains their argument regarding the famous ḥadīth ‘Actions are judged according to intentions.’ When opponents argue that this ḥadīth is deemed saḥīḥ despite the fact only ‘Umar narrated it in the Companion’s generation, the likes of Ibn al-‘Arabī reply by stating that this is difficult to accept, since he narrated this ḥadīth on the pulpit, in the presence of others. If they had only heard it for the first time, then they would surely have questioned him further regarding it. But this is a weak reply, since it is quite possible they all kept quiet individually, thinking that everyone else was familiar with the saying. Also, they may have remained silent because they all trusted ‘Umar and knew he would not narrate something unproven (al-'Uthaymin 2002, 59).

Ibn Ḥajar adds that even if we accept it as being gharīb at this point of the chain, ‘Alqama was alone after ‘Umar, and after ‘Alqama, Muḥammad ibn Ibrāhīm was the sole narrator, after which Yahyā ibn Sa’īd was alone. This is the correct chain according to the scholars of ḥadīth. Other chains are to be found for this ḥadīth but they are not considered authentic enough to consider.

Ibn Rushayd (d. 721/1321) states that it is sufficient to refute the claim of al-Qādī Abū Bakr when we remember that the first ḥadīth of al-Bukhārī is this ḥadīth of ‘Actions are judged according to intentions’, which is an ‘azīz ḥadīth.
5.5.1. Conclusion.

Three points can be deduced from this section on ʿazīz regarding the approach Ibn Ḥajar chose to adopt in the Nuzhah. Firstly, he provides clarification for what he saw as mistakes by his predecessors in the definitions and usage of the technical terms. This is shown when he refutes Ibn Ḥibbān and Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ. This also indicates that Ibn Ḥajar felt the need to explain differences of opinion in the Nuzhah, even if he did not agree with them personally.

Secondly, only four types of reports have been analysed so far, but we can already appreciate the boundaries Ibn Ḥajar set in the Nuzhah with regards to what to include and what to exclude. The issue of whether a ḥadīth has to be at least ʿazīz in order to be deemed as sound touches upon the issue of the acceptance of khabar al-āḥād (or khabar al-wāḥid) and whether a lone reporter is sufficient to guarantee a report’s authenticity.

Schacht shows that the acceptance of a lone reporter can be seriously questioned, since even ʿUmar was not content with the information of a single individual on a decision of the Prophet, but instead asked for conformation from a second source (1959, 50). Ibn Ḥajar sees such discussions as off-limit in the Nuzhah, despite its importance.62 Earlier scholars such as al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī did include sections on the acceptance of khabar al-āḥād in their works (1988, pp. 26-31). Ibn Ḥajar may have felt that this discussion would have prolonged his treatise, which he felt needed to be a mere introduction to ʿilm al-ḥadīth. Alternatively, he may have excluded such discussions because they pertain more to the legal sphere. His treatise, as he makes clear, deals purely with ʿilm al-ḥadīth.

In the section on mashhūr (5.4.) we already noted his refusal to elaborate on mustafīd, which he noted was a term used by the fiqh scholars. Again, here he does not spend energy on issues (the acceptance of khabar al-āḥād) which, though important to ‘ilm al-ḥadīth, could also be seen as more related to fiqh. So early on, we note his tendency to concentrate on purely ‘ilm al-hadīth matters. As the analysis on the Nuzhah proceeds, we will observe whether this theme continues and ask the possible reasons behind it.

Finally, he acts as an arbitrator between contrasting views on ḥadīth classification, as shown in the dispute whether a ḥadīth has to be at least ‘āẓīz in order to be deemed sound. The fact that he chooses to give this debate so much deliberation is interesting. Firstly, the argument was not topical since the likes of Abū ‘Alī al-Jubbāʾī lived six hundred years earlier. Secondly, the debate was not covered by other ‘ilm al-hadīth scholars: Abū Hafṣ al-Mayyānishī (d. 580/1184), Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ (d. 643/1245), al-Suyūṭī (d.911/1505) and al-Iraqī (d. 806/1404) all skipped this debate in their works. So why did Ibn Ḥajar give it attention? The climate of Ibn Ḥajar is crucial in answering this. With the ceasing of finding genuinely new ḥadīths, the attention turned to consolidating the existing ones, and widening the pool from which scholars of law and dogma could work from. By stating that a ḥadīth has to be at least ‘āẓīz in order to for it to be considered sound meant seriously diminishing the amount of ḥadīth literature available. This is why Ibn Ḥajar was insistent on clarifying this debate and giving the reader satisfaction that a ḥadīth could be reported by a solitary reporter, and still be considered as ṣaḥīḥ.
5.6/5.7. The Division of khabar al-aḥād into the ‘accepted’, the ‘rejected’ and the ‘paused upon.’

The fourth is gharīb. This is where one person is alone with its narration, regardless of where the singularity occurs in the isnād, [based] upon the forthcoming division into gharīb muṭlaq and gharīb nisbī. And all of them – namely the four aforementioned types, except the first which is mutawātir – are aḥād. Each one of them are [individually] called khabar al-wāḥid. Khabar al-wāḥid literally is that which is narrated by one person. In [ḥadīth] terminology, [it is] that which does not meet the conditions of mutawātir.

Amongst them – namely in aḥād – are the ‘accepted’. This is a report which is compulsory to act upon, according to the majority. Amongst them are [also] the ‘rejected’. This is a report where the truthfulness of the transmitter has not been established. [The division is such] because of the investigation [required] on the states of the narrators before using as evidence, to the exception of the first, which is mutawātir. Thus all mutawātir are accepted because of the certainty in the truthfulness of the khabar, as opposed to the other types of khabar al-āḥād.

But it is only compulsory to act upon the accepted of them. This is because either an essence of acceptance is found in it – and this is the proving of the transmitter’s truthfulness – or an attribute of rejection is found in it; and this is the proving of the untruthfulness of the transmitter. Thus [with] the first, the truthfulness of the khabar is overwhelmingly established, because of the truthfulness of the transmitter. [With] the second, the untruthfulness of the khabar is overwhelming established, because of the untruthfulness of the transmitter. Therefore it is repelled. When acting upon the khabar is paused upon, it becomes like the rejected [but] not because of the proving of an attribute of rejection, but because an attribute that necessitates acceptance is not found. And Allāh knows best.

Commentary

Khabar al-āḥād is divided into mashhūr, ‘azīz and gharīb, depending on how many transmitters are to be found in each generation. Having presented a discussion on mashhūr and ‘azīz, Ibn Ḥajar should ideally have dealt with the final type gharīb. However, even before concluding his analysis of all three types of khabar al-āḥād, here he introduces two other discussions on it. The first is the division of khabar al-āḥād into the accepted (maqīb), the rejected (mardūd) and the paused upon (mutawaqqaf). The second is again related to khabar al-āḥād and concerns how this can sometimes be coupled with advantageous, external factors that helps to strengthen a prophetic report. Ideally, he should have concluded the discussion on gharīb before pursuing these two new discussions. This is because these two discussions relate to mashhūr, ‘azīz and gharīb, not just mashhūr and ‘azīz. Therefore this is one of the places where Ibn Ḥajar’s Nuzhah suffers from inconsistency in presentation style.

Nevertheless, Ibn Ḥajar here is indicating that khabar al-āḥād can be subject to another form of division, not according to how many reporters there are in each generation, but whether the report is now worthy of acceptance or not. Worthy of attention in this section is the fact that Ibn Ḥajar almost explicitly suggests that the soundness of a ḥadīth is dependent solely on the ‘reporter’s truthfulness’. The rejected report, he writes, is where ‘the truthfulness of the transmitter has not been established’. There is no mention here of what role the matn (text) plays in determining whether a report is deemed accepted or rejected. Certainly this is a criticism which the discipline of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth has found difficult to respond to. The likes of Schacht (1959, 3) have exposed how the ḥadīth masters restricted their investigations almost exclusively to the isnād, and largely ignored the importance of the matn. Ibn Ḥajar’s writings here suggest that he too views the authenticity of a report dependant on the men reporting it.

5.7.1. Advantageous Factors.

Sometimes a factor is found in khabar al-ʿāḥad – which is divided into mashhūr, gharīb and ‘azīz – that gives the benefit of controvertible knowledge, based upon the chosen opinion. This is as opposed to those who deny that. The dispute in reality is literal. This is because those who permit the benefit of knowledge specify that the knowledge [given] is controvertible; this is achieved from evidence. Then those who refute it specify the word of ‘knowledge’ to mean mutawātir, and other than that, it is controvertible. But this does not negate that those [traditions] marked by factors are more preferred than those void of it. ⁶³

The [advantageous] factors that can be attached to the khabar are of many types. From them is that which the two *shaykh*s have recorded in their Ṣaḥīḥ, when it does not reach the stage of mutawātir. This [itself] is attached with many factors; amongst ⁶³ Ibn Ḥajar writes that there are some scholars who argue that it does not give this type of knowledge. In reality, it seems there is no difference of opinion, but rather there are lingual differences as to which type of knowledge it gives; (i) Those who say it does give knowledge mean it gives al-‘ilm al-nazarī. (ii) Those who say it does not give knowledge mean it doesn’t give al-‘ilm al-qāfī or mutawātir knowledge. Hence both mean the same thing.

them is their rank in this field, their precedence in differentiating the šaḥīḥ from others and the scholars’ acceptance of their books. [In fact] this acceptance alone is stronger in terms of giving the benefit of knowledge than mere numerous chains that are short of being mutawāṭir. However, this is specific to those [traditions] in the two books that have not been criticised by anyone from the experts, and to those [traditions] where a contradiction has not occurred between the two texts in the books, in such a way that one cannot be preferred; since it is impossible for two opposing facts to be truthful without preferring one over the other. With the exception of these two, the [scholarly] consensus exists upon accepting their authenticity. If it is said, the [scholars] have merely agreed on the necessity of acting upon them, not on their authenticity, we will disagree. The reason for disagreement is that they are unanimous upon the necessity of acting upon all [traditions] that are šaḥīḥ, even if the two shaykhs do not record it. Thus no uniqueness would remain for the two Šaḥīḥs, though the consensus exists regarding their uniqueness.64

Amongst the scholars who clarify that whatever the two shaykhs have recorded gives the benefit of controvertible knowledge are the al-Shaykh Abū Isḥāq al-Isfarā’īnī, and from the imāms of ḥadīth Abū ʿAbd Allāh al-Ḥumaydī, Abū al-Faḍl ibn Ṭāhir and others. It is possible to say that the aforementioned uniqueness refers to them being the most authentic of reports.

64 Some scholars suggest that the consensus is that it is wājib (compulsory) to act upon these reports from the two Šaḥīḥs, not that they are authentic. If this position is maintained, then surely it is necessary to act upon all šaḥīḥ reports, whether Muslim and al-Bukhārī have narrated it or not. Thus, the two Šaḥīḥs would have no reason to be considered superior to other compilations.
Amongst [the factors] is the mashhūr, when it has clear, individual chains free from the weakness of narrators and hidden ailments. Amongst those who have asserted that it gives the benefit of controvertible knowledge are al-Ustādh Abū Maṣṣūr al-Baghdādī, al-Ustādh Abū Bakr ibn Fūrak, and others.

Amongst [the factors] is the continuous isnād consisting of the expert, competent imāms, in such a way that it is not gharīb. [For instance], like the ḥadīth narrated by Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal (when someone else partners him) from al-Shāfi‘ī (when someone else partners him), from Mālik ibn Anas. For undoubtedly it gives the benefit of knowledge with evidence to the listener, in view of the grandeur of its narrators, and because they have suitable attributes that make them necessary to accept, which equals that which is narrated by a large number from others. There can be no doubt for one who has the smallest knowledge of this field and of the information of people that if Mālik – for example – participates in a khabar, then he is truthful in it. When this is coupled with someone who is of that same rank, it increases in strength and the fearing of mistakes becomes distanced.

With these types that we have mentioned, the knowledge of its authenticity is not attained except for a scholar of ḥadīth, who is emerged in it study, learned of the states of the narrators and aware of the hidden ailments. Others will not attain the knowledge of its authenticity because of his lack of these mentioned attributes, though it will for the experts.
The attainment of these three types we have mentioned – the first is that which is specific to the two Șahîh{s}, and the second is that which has many chains and the third is that which is narrated from the imâms – is possible in one 񧀧âdîth. At this time, it will not be far from being definitive in its authenticity. And Allâh knows best.

Commentary

In the second discussion relating to khabar al-âhâd, the author asserts that they sometimes have additional, external factors attached to it which gives the benefit of al-ʿilm al-naẓârî and therefore allows them to have preference over other reports void of them. Three types are identified by the author; (i) a ɦâdîth which al-Bûkhârî and Muslim have recorded in their Șahîh, when it does not reach the stage of mutawâtîr (b) a mashhûr ɦâdîth, when they have clear chains, free from weak narrators and hidden ailments (c) a ɦâdîth which the expert imâms continuously narrate, so long as they are not gharîb.

From these three factors, Ibn Ңâjar does not refer to mashhûr in detail, possibly because he has already presented a discussion on it (section 5.4.). He does elaborate on how a ɦâdîth which both al-Bûkhârî and Muslim have recorded in their Șahîhs is given preferential treatment. This, he explains, is:

i. Because of their status and rank as ɦâdîth experts and as pious Muslims.65

65 The title Amîr al-muʾminîn is frequently used to refer to al-Bûkhârî, which is perhaps the highest title that can be given to a ɦâdîth scholar. Qutayba ibn Șaʿîd said: ‘People from the east and west came to me to seek ɦâdîth, but no one was like al-Bûkhârî.’ (Mîghâlîwî 2003, 253). Ibn al-Madînî commented: ‘Al-Bûkhârî himself never met anyone of equal calibre to himself.’ (Mîghâlîwî 2003, 253).
His intellectual ability was also matched by his unparalleled piety. Al-Firabrî said: ‘Muḥammad ibn Ismâʿîl said to me: I never included in the Șaḥîh a ɦâdîth except I made a major ablution (ghusl) and prayed two rakaʿl before hand.’ (Haddad 2005, 105).
Al-Îmâm Muslim’s teacher Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wâhâb Farî said of him: ‘Muslim is a treasure of knowledge; I have seen nothing but good traits in him’ (Mîghâlîwî 2003, 265).
Because of their advanced ability to differentiate authentic sayings from rejected ones over other scholars.

The scholar’s acceptance of their work.

Ibn Ḥajar merely reinforces what Muslim scholars before him said on the exalted rank of these two masters and their works. Al-Ḥākim described the reports of the two shaykhs as the ‘first grade of what is sound’ (Robson 1953, 14) and Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ too gave them his backing.

Yet importantly, Ibn Ḥajar does not give their works an unequivocal backing. This is shown where he asserts that the reports mentioned in the two Ṣaḥīḥs will only be considered as advantageous when: (a) any of the ḥadīth masters (ḥāfīz) have not criticised the ḥadīth in question (b) there are no contradictions between two reports found in them in such a sense that one cannot be favoured over the other.

On the lively debate as to whether the two Ṣaḥīḥs contain weak reports, the Muslim scholars fall into two groups. The first group accepts the rank of the works, but acknowledges some shortcomings. For instance, in his Kitāb al-tatabbu‘, al-Dāraquṭnī argues that 78 weak reports are to be found in al-Bukhārī, 100 in Muslim and 32 that are to be found in both (Haddad 2005, 106).

The second group seem to defend al-Bukhārī and Muslim to the death, scholars such as al-Sūyūṭī and al-Dhahabī. They argue that all the reports to be found in the two Ṣaḥīḥs

66 Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ wrote: ‘The highest (the sound ḥadīth recorded by both al-Bukhārī and Muslim) is the first, and it is the one scholars of ḥadīth often call ‘agreed upon to be authentic.’ When they apply that term without qualification, they mean by it the agreement of al-Bukhārī and Muslim on it, and not the agreement of the Muslim community. However, the agreement of the Muslim community on it necessarily follows from the agreement of al-Bukhārī and Muslim and is concurrent with it, because of the agreement of the Muslim community to receive with acceptance whatever al-Bukhārī and Muslim agreed upon’ (1986, 28).
are ṣaḥīḥ, but not all of them reach the same high degree of ṣaḥīḥ. Al-Dhahabī notes that none fall below the rank of hasan, which one can also view as the lowest rank of ṣaḥīḥ (Haddad 2005, 107). Haddad explains:

> What al-Dāraquṭnī and others criticised is only on the basis that it did not reach the high criterion which each of them defined in their respective books. As for the [criterion of] soundness of the ḥadīths themselves, then both of them lived up to it (2005, 108).

Ibn Ḥajar seemingly belongs to the first group of scholars. Whilst he acknowledges the reputation and fame of al-Bukhārī and Muslim, he also accepts some deficiencies in their works.

The other factor which the author covers in detail is a ḥadīth which the expert imāms continuously narrate, so long as they are not gharīb. An example would be a ḥadīth which al-Imām Aḥmad narrates with another narrator. Then on the same topic, al-Imām al-Shāfiʿī narrates with another narrator, as well as al-Imām Mālik. Ibn Ḥajar gives three reasons for this in the Nuzhah.

But one can ask that if their rank stipulates their acceptance, then why does Ibn Ḥajar assert that another narrator must also be present with them? In the text itself, Ibn Ḥajar writes that such is their calibre and acceptance that their narration alone is equal in strength to several narrators. Surely a gharīb tradition narrated by one of the masters would still warrant its acceptance and preference, even if no other transmitter participates in the narration. No explanation is offered by Ibn Ḥajar.

Another criticism of this section is related to the last part in the Nuzhah. We are informed that sometimes, all three of these factors feature in just one ḥadīth. When this is the case, then the ḥadīth will be of great strength and not far from giving the benefit of al-ʿilm al-qatʿī (definitive knowledge). Despite this claim, an example of a particular tradition has not been offered by Ibn Ḥajar, or indeed any other scholar. Hence, this last statement is perhaps more hypothetical than practical. No narration of al-Imām al-Shāfīʿī is to be found in the works of al-Bukhārī and Muslim (al-Munāwī 1999, 1: 317).

To conclude, this section – along with some other, forthcoming sections⁶⁹ - touches upon the protectionism that certain famed, individuals hold in the discipline. Here, Ibn Ḥajar praises the piety of al-Bukhārī, Muslim and Mālik⁷⁰ and sees this as a reason for accepting their works too. An impartial observer is confused when he compares the opinions of such individuals from the Muslim scholars on the one hand and the non-Muslim ones on the other. For example, Juynboll describes Mālik as a common-link transmitter, which can be translated as a forger (1996, VIII: 310). Elsewhere Juynboll notes that Mālik was often at the tail-end of family isnāds, ‘and that it is therefore not inconceivable – albeit far from proven, of course – that he brought the rumour about a Ṣaḥīfa of ‘Amr — father — great grandfather — into circulation.’ (1996, XI: 174).

⁶⁸ The closest example is where Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal, al-Shāfīʿī and Mālik have featured in the isnād. There is only one such ḥadīth and even this, as al-Suyūṭī notes, is in reality four separate reports merged as one (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 78).

⁷⁰ He writes: ‘And there can be no doubt for one who has the smallest knowledge of this field and of the information of people that if Mālik – for example – participates in a khabar, then he is truthful in it.’
Perhaps it is impossible to objectively judge what al-Bukhārī, Muslim and Mālik were really like as Muslims and as scholars, because they lived so long ago. Juynboll did not meet them but then nor did Ibn Ḥajar. But that has not prevented a perception being painted by others; the Muslims who see them as largely competent and pious and the non-Muslims who see them in a lesser light. The theory of Orientalism helps to answer the polemics of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. Edward Said explains:

For if it is true that no production of knowledge in the human sciences can ever ignore or disclaim its author’s involvement as a human subject in his own circumstances, then it also must be true that for a European or American studying the Orient, there can be no disclaiming the main circumstances of his actuality: he comes up against the Orient as a European or American first, as an individual second (1995, 11).

In other words, Ibn Ḥajar, as a Muslim, had a vested interest in defending the piety and ability of his fellow Muslims, and hence the positive review. The non-Muslims do not necessarily have this vested interest, and hence the more critical review. Sometimes it is not the empirical data in front of us that affects our conclusions, but our actuality. As the main analysis of the Nuzhah proceeds, there will be other places where the theory of Orientalism can play a role in our understanding of the discipline.
5.8. Gharīb/Fard.

Then the singularity is either at the root of the isnād – which is the place where the chain circulates and returns to, even if the paths to it are numerous; namely the Companion’s side – or it is not at the root of the isnād. This [latter form] is when the singularity occurs in its duration. [This is] like when more than one narrates from the Companion, then one person is alone in its narration. Thus the first is fard muţlaq, like the ḥadīth of the prohibition of selling walā’ and of its gift.\(^{71}\) ‘Abd Allāh ibn Dīnār was alone from Ibn ‘Umar. Sometimes one narrator is solitary from that single person, like the ‘Branches of Faith’ ḥadīth.\(^{72}\) Abū Ṣāliḥ is alone from Abū Hurayra and ‘Abd Allāh ibn Dīnār is alone after Abū Ṣāliḥ. Sometimes the singularity continues throughout the transmission, or most of it. Many examples of such are in the Musnad of al-Bazzār and al-Mu’jam al-awsat of Ṭabarānī.

The second is fard nisbī. It is called nisbī because the singularity has occurred in relation to a specific person, even if the ḥadīth per se is mashhūr. Rarely is the term fard applied to fard nisbī though gharīb and fard are synonymous, literally and terminologically. However, the people of terminology have differentiated between the two in terms of frequent and infrequent usage. Thus fard is mostly applied to fard muţlaq and gharīb is mostly applied to fard nisbī. This is in terms of their usage as nouns. As for their usage in terms of the derived verb, then they do not differentiate. Thus they say for muţlaq and nisbī, tafarrada bihī fulān (‘x was solitary in reporting it’) or aghraba bihī fulān (‘x was solitary in reporting it’).

\(^{72}\) The Prophet said: ‘Faith consists of seventy-something branches. The highest is to testify that there is no God but Allāh and the lowest is to remove a (harmful) object from the path. And modesty is a branch of Faith.’
Similar to this difference is muṇqāṭī and mursal. Are they different or not? Most scholars [agree] upon its difference, but [only] in terms of its usage as a noun. As for usage as the derived verb, they use ʿirsāl only. So they say ʿarsalāhū fulān (‘x made it discontinuous’), regardless whether that was mursal or muṇqāṭī. Then there are numerous [scholars] who do not consider the place of its usage, in that they do not differentiate between mursal and muṇqāṭī. And they are not the same, for the reasons we have explained. Only a few are aware of this point. And Allāh knows best.

5.8.1. Fard muṭlaq and fard nisbī.

Ibn Ḥajar concludes his discussion on mutawātir and khabar al-aḥād with a look at the last type of the former. When the isnād contains a solitary reporter in a particular generation, then it is called gharīb or fard. There are two types, fard muṭlaq and fard nisbī.

Owing to the confusion surrounding the usage of these two terms, the author offers an excellent explanation of where each term is and should be applied. This particular part of the Nuzhah gives an indication of who his target-audience was. Ibn Ḥajar eradicates any confusion that exists between gharīb and fard, explains which is typically used to denote fard muṭlaq and fard nisbī and warns readers not to confuse the usage of the terms when they are used as a noun and when they are used as a verb. Certainly, this indicates that the Nuzhah was meant as an introductory text to the study of ʿilm al-ḥadīth for the first time. Even today, the Nuzhah is largely used as an introductory treatise on the discipline in Muslim universities and seminaries. The clarity shown by Ibn Ḥajar here indicates why the Nuzhah was and still is an indispensable guide for the field.

5.8.2. Conclusion.

We previously briefly noted (section 5.7.1) that Orientalism can play a part in understanding why the Muslims and non-Muslims have reached such different conclusions in the discipline of ʿilm al-ḥadīth. In general, the Muslims have a more optimistic view on the authenticity of ḥadīth material. Noth epitomised the polemics when he remarked:

> Leaving aside the fact that the autonomous Muslim ʿilm al-ḥadīth as well as Orientalist ḥadīth scholarship recognise the existence of ḥadīth forgery, the two groups do not seem to have much in common. The reason for this is that the burden of proof in the case of ḥadīth forgery is distributed differently: For Muslim ḥadīth scholars, it has to be proved that a ḥadīth is a forgery; for Orientalists, that it is genuine (in Motzki (ed.) 2004, 310).

Yet using the discussion presented by Ibn Ḥajar on gharīb and fard, it is possible to show how both Muslims and non-Muslims can benefit from one another, towards a better, more impartial and more objective appreciation of the discipline. Two issues will be raised here that are related specifically to gharīb and fard, one where the Muslims can learn from the non-Muslims, and one where the non-Muslims can learn from the Muslims:
a. Where the Muslims can benefit.

One of the prominent theories of Schacht is the idea of the Common Link (CL) transmitter. He argues that a common link in the chain of transmission indicates that the ḥadīth in question originated at the time of that common member (1959, pp. 171-172). This person is then responsible for providing a fictitious isnād back to the Companion and the Prophet.

I wish to show that his theory can be assessed in the light of Ibn Ḥajar’s writings on fard nisbī, where the singularity occurs in some other part of the chain and not at the side of the Companion. Common sense dictates that the chains of transmission are usually expansive in nature rather than shrinking. In other words, as the isnād progresses, we expect to find more transmitters. But fard nisbī is where there are more people in the first part of the chain and then this shrinks to a solitary reporter later. This resembles the common link form that Schacht was keen to portray. Therefore the cases where the isnād becomes solitary in its duration, namely fard nisbī, is more likely to have been ‘projected’ backwards. Otherwise, it is difficult to explain why a report, for example, was reported by two Companions and two Successors, only for them both to report to one solitary person in the generation thereafter. We would expect to see the isnād expand in its later part and not shrink. It can therefore be argued that Ibn Ḥajar and the scholars before him actually gave a name to the common link theory of Schacht in fard nisbī.

Ibn Ḥajar explains the form that fard nisbī assumes in the Nuzhah but not why it takes on this shape. The lack of clarification from him and indeed other Muslim scholars adds to the suspicion surrounding this type. It is here where Muslims can re-assess the evidence after appreciating the issues presented by non-Muslim academics.
As a criticism of this comparison between the common link theory and fard nisbi, one important point is worthy of mention. A common link transmitter would certainly want his report to gain acceptance, and therefore he would only claim to have heard from reliable and trustworthy reporters. But then there are unexplainable cases where the person the report has supposedly been projected back to is weak and rejected. This can only be the case where the isnād is genuine. Otherwise, no right-minded transmitter would project the report back to weak reporters and thus have his report rejected.

a. Where the non-Muslims can benefit.

Importantly, Ibn Hajar writes that the cases where the singularity continues throughout the chain of transmission are not those reports which are recorded in the six canonical collection. Rather such reports are to be found in the lesser books of compilations, such as the Musnad of al-Bazzār.73 This contrasts with the opinion of Juynboll who writes:

> In other words, canonical Muslim tradition literature is first and foremost characterised by the feature that the transmission of a particular saying allegedly uttered by the Prophet travelled during the first sixty to one hundred and fifty years or so of its existence along a path of consecutive single individuals. (1996, VII: 172).

Juynboll’s observations are part of his theory on the role of the mu’ammarūn, which will be dealt with in Section 5.51. Elsewhere, Juynboll gives an indication why he was keen to portray single individuals in a chain as the predominant norm in ḥadīth transmission; because he felt that ‘more often than not, [it is] a sure sign of its having been put together by the youngest person mentioned in that strand or possibly the latter’s master’ (XI: 154). But for our analysis here, we must first note that Ibn Ḥajar totally differs with Juynboll regarding where the bulk of gharīb reports are to be found. Juynboll believes that the works of Muslim, al-Bukhārī, al-Tirmidhī and their likes are littered with them whereas Ibn Ḥajar believes they are confined to the lesser works like al-Mu’jam al-awsat of Ṭabarānī. Al-Mayyānishī asserted that one of the conditions of al-Bukhārī and Muslim was that at least two or more narrated from the Prophet, and then at least four narrate from each of these.74 If this opinion is accepted, then it means that chains marked by a ‘path of consecutive single individuals’ was at the very least a rarity for two of the six major ḥadīth compilations, and not the norm.

Moreover, the works of Azami in particular cast doubts about the common nature of gharīb reports that Juynboll is so keen to depict. In his analysis of the works of Suhayl, he found that there were only five reports where the isnād featured one report from the Companion, transmitted to one Successor and then to one further reporter. There are eleven traditions where only one Companion has reported it to one Successor, but the report has been attested by other Companions. Thirty-two traditions take on the form where a certain Companion has more than one student and this is attested with similar-wording reports from other Companions. Azami identifies only a single tradition that takes the form of fard nisbī: namely where a report is transmitted from many Companions but later, there is only a single transmitter (Azami 1992, 236). In other words, most of the work is distinguished by mashhūr and ʿazīz reports, rather than gharīb. And the semi-contentious fard nisbī is only found once in the works.

My approach here has not been to answer who is correct and who is not. Rather, it aims to show that our understanding of the discipline is best appreciated through knowledge, Muslim and non-Muslim knowledge. For too long, the sceptism (as highlighted by the quote from Noth) has acted as a barrier to both parties from accepting each other’s views. In short, the Nuzhah can help us to understand and answer new approaches laid down by non-Muslim scholars to some degree. Crucially, new approaches laid down by non-Muslim scholars can also help us to understand the Nuzhah, as shown with the similarity between Schacht’s view on Common Link (CL) transmitter and fard nisbī.

The khabar al-āḥad with the transmission of upright and completely accurate [narrators], coupled with the continuation of the iṣnād, without it [being] shādhdh or muʿallal, is [called] ṣaḥīḥ li-dhātiḥ. This is the first division of the accepted into four types. This [division exists] because either it consists of attributes of acceptance upon its highest form, or it does not. The former is ṣaḥīḥ li-dhātiḥ; and the second – if something is found which compensates for that shortcoming, like numerous chains – then it is ṣaḥīḥ too, but not li-dhātiḥ. And where there is no compensating factor, then it is ḥasan li-dhātiḥ. If an indication is found that gives preference to the side of acceptance in what was [previously] paused upon, then this is ḥasan too, but not li-dhātiḥ. The dialogue for ṣaḥīḥ li-dhātiḥ has been preceded because of its high rank.

Commentary

Perhaps owing to its importance, Ibn Ḥajar offers an extensive analysis on ṣaḥīḥ. The discussion commences with four divisions of the accepted (maqbūl). They are;

i. Ṣaḥīḥ li-dhātiḥ- the Sound per se. This is a tradition that fulfills the five conditions mentioned above, which the author elaborates on later.

ii. Ṣaḥīḥ li-ghayriḥ- the Sound by other. In essence, this is a ḥadīth that is ḥasan in terms of grading. However it is promoted to the rank of ṣaḥīḥ due to the appearance of evidence that suggests its authenticity, like numerous, supporting chains. Since it was originally ḥasan, it cannot be labelled as ṣaḥīḥ outright, and thus it is called ṣaḥīḥ li-ghayrih, or ‘Sound by other means’ rather than per se.

iii. Ḥasan li-dhā‘īth - the Fair per se. As Ibn Ḥajar later explains, this is a ṣaḥīḥ ḥadīth in all respects, except the accuracy of the narrator is not of the highest standard.

iv. Ḥasan li-ghayrih- the Fair by other. Here, Ibn Ḥajar suggests that a ḥadīth which was previously not acted upon due to some weakness can be upgraded to the rank of hasan, when supporting evidence is found. Again, because it was not originally Fair, it is only given the title of Ḥasan li-ghayrih, or Fair by other means.

This opening section is very clear. It outlines the four types of the accepted and how they relate to one another. He then proceeds to offer a detailed commentary of the first type, ṣaḥīḥ li-dhā‘īth:

What is meant by ‘upright’ is whosoever possesses a force that carries him upon the adherence of pious, courteous behaviour. What is meant by piety (taqwā) is the refraining from evil acts, namely polytheism, lewdness and innovation. ‘Accuracy’ is of two types; the accuracy of the chest; this is that he preserves what he has heard in a fashion such that he can present it when he wishes. [And the second type of accuracy] is accuracy of the book; this is protecting it in his possession from the time that he heard it, to verify it, until the point he gives it. Added is the condition of ‘completely’ to indicate the higher rank in that. ‘Continuation’ is that whose isnād is free from any drop, in the sense that all of them from the men have heard the narrated [text] from their shaykh. The ‘sanad’; its definition has been mentioned. ‘Mu'allal’ literally is that which contains a defect. Terminologically, it is that in which there is a hidden, defamatory, defect. Shādhdh literally means solitarily and terminologically, it is that [tradition] in which the narrator has been opposed by someone more preferred. And for it is another interpretation; this will soon come, if Allāh wills.

Commentary

5.9.1. Defining ṣaḥīḥ.

Ibn Ḥajar defines a ṣaḥīḥ ḥadīth as the ‘transmission of upright and completely accurate [narrators], with the continuation of the chain, without it [being] shādhdh or mu'allal.’ For reasons that will become clear later, it is worth comparing this with what some other ḥadīth masters – before and after Ibn Ḥajar – have said regarding the definition of ṣaḥīḥ.

a. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ (d. 643/1245) defines the ṣaḥīḥ as ‘a supported (musnad) ḥadīth, the isnād of which coheres continuously throughout the transmission of one upright and accurate person from another up to its point of termination. The sound ḥadīth can be neither shādhdh nor mu'allal’ (1986, 11-12). Though worded slightly differently, it is in essence the same as the definition offered by Ibn Ḥajar, because he mentions the same conditions.

75 The term ṣaḥīḥ as used here to describe prophetic traditions metaphorically. This is because the word literally (ḥaqīqa) is used in Arabic to describe persons and bodies (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 64).
b. Al-‘Irāqī (d. 806/1403), who was the teacher of Ibn Ḥajar, defines ṣaḥīḥ in his Alfiyya as ‘the continuously supported, with the transmission of the upright and accurate throughout the chain, without it being shādhdh and without the existence of a hidden defect which harms it’ (1995, 7). Again, the definition is identical.

c. Al-Suyūṭī (d.911/1505) defined it as a ḥadīth ‘whose isnād in continuous with upright, accurate reporters, without it [being] shādhdh or mu’allal’ (1972, 1: 64).

From these definitions offered by the Muslim scholars, we can see notice the conformity quite clearly. The key elements mentioned by Ibn Ḥajar are to be found in the definitions offered by those before him and indeed after him. In fact, we note that even when Muslim scholars have offered a different definition, the others have suggested it still confirms with that of the majority. It is as differences are muted quickly. Two examples will be sufficient to prove this:

a. Al-Khaṭṭābī (d. 388/998) defined ṣaḥīḥ as ‘ma ittaṣala sanaduhū wa-‘addalat naqlatuhū’, or ‘whose chain is continuous and whose transmission is verified reliable’ (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 64). Note that in this version, there is no mention of the transmitters being accurate and that the report must not be shādhdh or mu’allal. Rather than accepting his difference of opinion, the other Muslim scholars have attempted to show that at least implicitly, these three elements are to be found in his definition. Al-Suyūṭī believes this very fact, on the basis that he used the word ‘addalat rather than ‘adalat. The former refers to when a narrator is verified as being reliable, by other marked scholars. ‘A negligent, deserved of disregard is not described as being verified reliable by the companions of ḥadīth, though he may express ‘adl in his religion’, al-Suyūṭī writes (1972:
1: 64). Al-Nawawī too comes to the defence of the established definition of ṣaḥīḥ when he states that the comprehensiveness of the term ‘adl means it automatically negates the inaccuracy of the narrator. He writes:

The condition of ‘adāla stipulates the truthfulness of the narrator, the absence of negligence and the absence of disregard at the point of preserving the report (in al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 64).

What this shows therefore is that though al-Khaṭṭābī’s definition is much shorter, it is still the same as Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ’s and Ibn Ḥajar’s, or made to look the same as theirs.

b. Al-Ḥākim (d. 405/1014) writes in ‘Ullum al-ḥadīth that for a report to be considered sound, the reporter ‘must be known (mashhūr) for seeking ḥadīth’ (cited in al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 69). This is an addition to what the likes of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ and Ibn Ḥajar have offered. But again, this addition is quickly portrayed as being no different to the established definition. Al-Nawawī believes that the condition of ḏāḥt encompasses this element, since being known for narrating simply means that he has great care and consideration for the task. Al-Samʿānī echoed this sentiment when he wrote:
The šahīḥ [reporter] is not merely known to narrate from the authoritative. It is being renowned for understanding, acknowledgment, excessive listening and revision (in al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 70).

Therefore, even the slight variations to be found from some Muslim scholars can be interpreted and incorporated into the widely-accepted definition of šahīḥ.

The fact is that from the fourth Islamic century until Ibn Ḥajar’s time, the definition of šahīḥ has never really been questioned. It has been refined and tweaked, but not at all revamped and critically assessed. For some scholars, it is not just the definition of šahīḥ that has suffered from stagnation, but the entire discipline of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. For instance, Ibn Ḥībbān (d. 354/965) said:

…I see that the [Islamic] disciplines are all developing except this discipline [of ḥadīth]. For this is declining day by day (in al-Munāwī 1999, 1: 4).

This quote from Ibn Ḥībbān suggests that even by the fourth Islamic century, ḥadīth scholars had succumbed to apathy and were happy to confirm to what their predecessors had written. In the definition of šahīḥ, we can appreciate the point Ibn Ḥībbān was making.

For the sake of our analysis of the Nuzhah, we find that Ibn Ḥajar does not deviate from the works of his predecessors in defining šahīḥ. Instead, he opted for uniformity.

What Ibn Ḥajar does do in the Nuzhah is accept the widely-held definition of šahīḥ and then indulge in a pinpoint analysis of each important word found in it. So we are given a detailed analysis of (i) 'adl (ii) ḍabṭ (iii) tāmm (iv) itiṣāl (v) sanad (vi) mu'allal (vii) shâdhdh. In fact, ‘adl is given a two-tier analysis by him. This is because he defines ‘adl as ‘a force that carries him upon the adherence of taqwā and marūwa (or marū‘a). He then proceeds to define taqwā and marūwa too. Perhaps the added detail on ‘adl from Ibn Ḥajar was so that he could show that a reporter must be known for his taqwā as much as his ability to transmit accurately; he reminds readers that ‘ilm al-ḥadīth has a religious worth and not just an academic one. In transmitting the words and actions of the Prophet, reporters are expected to follow his model too.

Ibn Ḥajar did not want to question the definition of şahīḥ which he inherited from his predecessors in the field. He accepted it unequivocally. This definition was almost like an unchangeable constitution, engraved in stone. His duty, it seems, was to elaborate and laud it, as the next part of the Nuzhah suggests.

Note: His saying ‘and the khabar al-āḥād’ is like the jins and the remaining conditions are like faṣl. His saying ‘with the transmission of upright’ excludes what is transmitted by non-upright [reporters]. His saying ‘it’ [huwa] is called faṣl 76; it appears between the predicate and the news. It states that whatever appears after it is the news for what is before it, and is not its description. And his saying ‘li-dhātihi’ excludes that which is şahīḥ through an external matter, like it has passed.

76 The damīr huwa appearing in between clarifies that the two parts of the sentence are not related through the means of mawsūf and sīfa (the described and the description) (al-Wajidī 1996, 54).
Here, Ibn Ḥajar comments on the literary style employed in defining ṣaḥīḥ from a grammatical perspective. The definition takes on the form of jīns and faṣl, where a general, universal statement is made followed by a more precise description of who or what is excluded from it.

This text of the Nuzhah does not in any way add to our understanding what ṣaḥīḥ is. It is merely a grammatical analysis of the widely-accepted definition of ṣaḥīḥ.

So we see that in this section on ṣaḥīḥ, Ibn Ḥajar meticulously elaborates on ṣaḥīḥ. But it is hardly thought-provoking, critical or evaluative. It is quite a superficial analysis. Had it have been more critical, then he may have questioned the absence of reference to the matn in the definition of ṣaḥīḥ. Had it been more reflective of his climate, he may have highlighted the fact that elevation – which was so preciously sought in his time – is not a condition for ṣaḥīḥ (Dickinson 2002, 491). What he does do is show the dependency on the men reporting the report as a means of establishing its authenticity, as the next section suggests.

5.9.3. The ‘most sound of chains’.

The ranks of ṣaḥīḥ differ, according to the varying attributes that are required for authenticity in terms of strength. For indeed when it gives the benefit of overwhelming thought – upon which is the basis of soundness – this stipulates that for it will be stages, some higher than others in accordance to the strengthening matters. When the matter is as such then that [report] whose transmitters are of the highest calibre in reliability and accuracy and all of the other attributes that necessitate soundness, will be more authentic than what is void of this. Thus from the highest rank in that [matter] is that which some imāms have declared as the most sound of chains; like al-Zuhri — Sālim ibn ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Umar — his father; and like Muḥammad ibn Sīrīn — ‘Ubayd ibn ‘Amr — ‘Alī; and like Ibrāhīm al-Nakha‘ī — ‘Alqama — Ibn Mas‘ūd. Less than that in rank is like Burayd ibn ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Umar ibn Abī Burda — his grandfather — his father Abū Mūsā; and like Ḥammād ibn Salama — Thābit — Anas. Less than that in rank is like Suhayl ibn Abī Ṣāliḥ — his father — Abū Hurayra; and like ‘Alā’ ibn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān — his father — Abū Hurayra. For verily all of them comprise the name of integrity and accuracy, except that in the highest stage are preferred attributes that stipulate precedence over the ones which are next. In the next stage are strengths of accuracy that stipulate precedence upon the third. And this [third stage] is preceded upon the ones which are considered as Fair only, like Muḥammad ibn Ishāq — ‘Āsim ibn ‘Umar — Jābir; and [like] ‘Amr ibn Shu‘ayb, from his father, from his grandfather.
Perform analogy with these stages with that which is similar to it in [terms of] preferred attributes. The highest rank is that which some imāms have declared as the ‘most sound of chains.’ The depended [opinion] is the non-declaration [with this title] to a specific chain. Yes, the chains that the imāms have mentioned [as such] are deserved of precedence over the chains they have not declared as such.

Commentary

We have already seen in this main section that Ibn Ḥajar largely refers to the isnād rather then the matn. For him, the credibility of the reporters plays a paramount role in determining the acceptance and rejection of a report. In this section, Ibn Ḥajar explains the issue of the aṣaḥḥ al-asānīd, or the ‘most sound of chains.’ Again, it indicates how important the isnād was for him.

If, the author explains, a report has a chain of highly-credible reporters then this adds to its validity. Ibn Ḥajar offers examples of such chains, such as al-Zuhrī — Sālim ibn ‘Abd Allāh — Ibn ‘Umar, which is considered the ‘most sound of chains’ by Ishāq ibn Rāhawiyya and Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 77). He also offers examples of chains which are considered slightly less in terms of credibility, such as the family isnād of Burayd ibn ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Umar ibn Abī Burda.

The lively discussion on aṣaḥḥ al-asānīd goes back to the early period of hadīth compilation. Other than the ones mentioned by Ibn Ḥajar above, examples are Mālik — Nāfī’— Ibn ‘Umar, vouched for by al-Īmām al-Bukhārī (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 78), and al-Zuhrī — ‘Alī ibn al-Ḥusayn — his father — ‘Alī, vouched for by Abū Bakr ibn Abī Shayba (Ibid.).

Is there benefit to be derived from listing certain chains as the most sound? In principal, Ibn Ḥajar believes there is. The chains can be used as a litmus paper test to examine the worth of other chains.77 Also, as al-‘Uthaymin points out, knowing the ‘most sound of chains’ is useful when two reports contradict one another; the report with the higher grade of reporters is one factor by which a report can be preferred (2002, 110).

77 This is shown where Ibn Ḥajar says: ‘And perform analogy with these stages with that which is similar to it in [terms of] preferred attributes.’
But interestingly, Ibn Ḥajar does not give the practice unequivocal backing. Firstly, Ibn Ḥajar’s main reservation – it seems – is that people may begin considering these chains are authentic without doubt, to the exclusion of all other chains that are not classified as such. The conditions of acceptance for a particular report depend on many factors and not just the reliability and accuracy of the narrators. Al-‘Alā’ī voices this sentiment when he writes:

‘As for the chain, a group has classified them as such (namely the most sound of chains’). As for the ḥadīth [in its entirety], it is not explicitly stated from anyone from the experts of ḥadīth that such and such ḥadīth is unequivocally the most sound of reports. This is because the chain being the most sound of chains does not necessarily mean the matn will be as such too’ (cited in al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 77).

78 It is clear that Ibn Ḥajar has followed the steps of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ when refraining from decreeing a chain as the ‘most sound’ in general. The latter writes:
‘The grades of sound ḥadīth vary in potency according to the degree that the ḥadīth possesses the aforementioned characteristics upon which soundness is based. In view of this, sound ḥadīth can be categorised into innumerable subcategories. For this reason, we think it is better to refrain from judging any chain or ḥadīth to be the absolute most sound, although a number of authorities have ventured into this matter and their opinions were therefore contradictory. We heard that Ishāq ibn Rāhawayh said: ‘the soundest of all chains is al-Zuhrī, from Sālim [ibn ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Umar], from his father.’ We also heard something similar from Ḥanbal. We heard that Ṭālib ibn ‘Alī al-Fallās said: ‘the soundest chain is Muḥammad ibn Sirīn, from ‘Ubayda ibn ‘Amr from ‘Alī.’ We heard something similar from ‘Alī ibn al-Maḍīnī and this view was related from others too. There are some who specify the narrator from Muḥammad ibn Sirīn, some making him Ṭālib al-Sakhtiylānī and others Ibn ‘Awn. One of the things we hear from Yahyā ibn Ma’in is that he said: ‘the finest chain is al-A’mash from Ibrāhīm al-Nakha’ī, from ‘Alqama from Ibn Mas‘ūd.’ We heard that Abū Bakr ibn Abī Shayba said: ‘the soundest of all isnāds is al-Zuhrī, from ‘Alī ibn al-Husayn, from his father, from ‘Alī.’ We heard that Abū ‘Abd Allāh al-Bukhārī – the author of the Şahih – said: ‘the soundest of all chains is Mālik, from Nāfi’, from Ibn ‘Umar.’ The expert Abū Maṣūr ‘Abd al-Qāhir ibn Ṭāhir al-Tamīnī extrapolated from this that the most exalted chain must be al-Shāfi’ī from Mālik from Nāfi’ from Ibn ‘Umar, and he cited as proof the consensus of the scholars of ḥadīth that there was no transmitter from Mālik more exalted than al-Shāfi’ī. And God knows best.’ (1986, pp. 14-16)
In other words, there is an acceptance that the best possible reporters do not mean the best possible ḥadīth. A ḥadīth consists of two parts, the isnād and matn. Having the ‘most sound of chains’ tells us little about the matn.

Secondly, the practice may lead to academic apathy. Once a tradition has the ‘most sound of chains’, the observer may accept it unequivocally and refuse to investigate its authenticity any further.

Thirdly, Ibn Ḥajar’s refusal to give this practice total backing could be due to an epistemological reason. The discipline of ‘ilm al-rijāl is not an exact science since ultimately the authenticity of a report lies largely with the interaction and rationality (or irrationality) of the reporters. Even if all the reporters of a particular chain are of the highest calibre, there is still no guarantee that they did not slip or err in reporting it. Perhaps this is why Ibn Ḥajar wrote that the ‘depended [opinion] is the non-declaration [with this title] to a specific chain.’ Quite simply, this is because ‘ilm al-rijāl cannot be made scientific. Siddiqi writes:

The Muslims not only gave a scientific form and basis to the system of isnād, but also tried to make a comparative study of the various isnāds deployed in the literature, with a view of establishing their relative value. It is said that Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal, Ibn Maʿīn and Ibn al-Madīnī once gathered together with some other traditionists and debated which was the most authentic of all isnāds…the consensus among later traditionists, however, was that it is impossible to qualify any isnād as the best of all (1993, 81).
Certainly, ‘ilm al-ḥadīth as often been translated as ‘the science of ḥadīth.’ Most scholars, Muslims and non-Muslims, have assumed this to be the correct definition for it. Daniel Brown has repeatedly used this terminology (1999, pp. 9, 28, 93, 99, 110) as has Ṣiddīqī (1993, pp. 38, 84, 108, 115). Perhaps the reason for this is that ‘science’ is characterised by a high-level of precision, objectivity, and the ability to prove or disprove rigid hypotheses. Brown and Ṣiddīqī may have translated ‘ilm al-ḥadīth as a science because of the existence of formal rules and procedures laid down by ḥadīth scholars to determine the authenticity of narrators and reports. If the narrator – for example – is found to be neglectful and has a short memory, then his reports will not be accepted. If he is trustworthy, pious and intelligent, then his report will be accepted. If the matn consists of a ruling which complies with the Qur’ān perfectly, then it is accepted. If the matn refers to a matter which does not fit with the established and consensual doctrines of Islam, it is to be rejected. To a considerable extent, therefore, it is simple to see why ‘ilm al-ḥadīth is described as a ‘science of ḥadīth’; because it is marked with a level of formality and objectivity, just like physics and chemistry is.

However, the issue of the ‘most sound of chains’ has highlighted the certain frailties in describing ‘ilm al-ḥadīth or ‘ilm al-rijāl as a ‘science.’ Though the discipline is marked with strict procedures and analytical methods, it is ultimately the study of men, and men do not behave like compounds and elements in chemistry. This explains why Ibn Ḥajar acknowledged the practice of labelling certain chains as the ‘most sound’, but stopped short of giving it unequivocal backing.
This analysis of the ‘most sound of chains’ here in the Nuzhah does show some insight and evaluative skills from the author. Whereas in the definition of sahīḥ he shows rigid conformity to his predecessors, Ibn Ḥajar does at least question a practice that they indulged in. More importantly, he steps back and accepts that men are fallible. And if this is the case, then he is also implicitly accepting that ḥadīth literature can be subject to changes, shortcomings, alterations and indeed forgery.

Ibn Ḥajar indicates a lukewarm reservation on the ‘most sound of chains.’ But he does not question them empirically. The findings of the non-Muslim academics do. Schacht argues that the chain Mālik — Nāfī‘— Ibn ‘Umar, which incidentally al-Bukhārī personally sees as the ‘most sound of chains’, is dubious. Based on the birth and death-dates of Mālik and Nāfī‘, Schacht doubts whether they could have exchanged reports first-hand and believes that his reporting from him was perhaps based on written reports. Secondly, because Nāfī‘ was the freedman of Ibn ‘Umar, the isnād is now a ‘family isnād’, which he sees as a ‘general indication of the spurious character of the tradition in question’ (Schacht 1959, pp. 176-177).

In response, the Muslim scholar Azami (1996) has revealed some shortcomings in Schacht’s views. Firstly, Schacht writes that Nāfī‘ died in 117 and Mālik in 179, meaning their association could only have been when ‘Mālik was little more than a boy’ (1959, 177). Azami points out that the bibliographical works state that Mālik was born in 93, with other variations putting the date as 90, 94 and 97. But there is no one who suggests he was born later than this. Therefore ‘Mālik was at least twenty years old, if not 24 or 27, when Nāfī‘ died’ (Azami 1996, 171). Moreover, both lived in the same city, which meant their exchanges were more likely to have been in person rather than through written reports. Secondly, the ‘family isnād’ can be viewed in two ways. Schacht believes it was ‘only a device for securing its appearance’ (1959, 170), whereas it can also be viewed as a more rigid form of reporting. Family members engaged in ḥadīth narration will enjoy extensive companionship and this prolonged company will mean more opportunities to check and revise the ḥadīth from the source.\(^{79}\)

Despite Azami’s response to Schacht, questions still remain regarding the chain Mālik — Nāfi‘— Ibn ‘Umar. Juynboll’s detailed analysis of the position of Nāfi‘ in ḥadīth literature shows that the isnād ‘cannot be maintained as a historically feasible chain of transmission’ (1996, IX, 241). Like Schacht, he questioned whether Mālik could have heard from Nāfi‘ directly. Firstly, all the biographical information available to us on Nāfi‘ is from Mālik himself, which, for Juynboll, raises suspicions (1996, IX, 219). Secondly, he cites reports which show that Mālik was a šābb or fatā (youth or boy) in the year 134/752, which seems to suggest that Mālik was born in the year Nāfi‘ died. Thirdly, Juynboll shows through his ‘isnād bundle analysis’ that Nāfi‘ is the common link transmitter in isnād strands, thus suggesting the lack of ‘tangible evidence’ for the respect and popularity this chain holds (1996, IX: 238).

If Juynboll’s findings are accepted, then the entire debate surrounding the ‘most sound of chain’ is thrown into jeopardy. This is because if the most famous sound chain, Mālik — Nāfi‘— Ibn ‘Umar, is questionable and suspect to fraud, then this raises questions about the other ones too. It also raises questions about the authority of al-Bukhārī and al-Shāfi‘ī, who vouched for the soundness of this particular isnād.

\(^{79}\) More will be said on ‘family isnāds’ in section 5.50.
Viewed from afar, this is an example where the debate has taken place on empirical evidence and the Muslim scholars and the non-Muslim ones are engaged in a healthy debate. There is more reliance on facts than perception. This suggests that the interaction between them can be of great benefit to both parties.

5.9.4. The superiority of the Şahîh of Muslim and the Şahîh of al-Bukhârî.

Related to this superiority is that which the two shaykhs have agreed upon in [recording it in their] compilations, in relation to what [only] one of them has recorded. [This is followed by] what al-Bukhârî has recorded in relation to what Muslim has recorded alone. [This is] because of the agreement of the scholars after them of taking their books with acceptance. There is a dispute regarding which one of them is preferred; [though] what they both agree on is more preferred in this respect over what they have not agreed upon. The majority has clarified the precedence of the Şahîh of al-Bukhârî in terms of soundness. The opposite claim (that Şahîh of Muslim is preferred) has not been found from anyone. As for what has been reported from Abû ‘Alî al-Nîsâbûrî that ‘there is nothing under the sky more authentic than the book of Muslim’, he did not state that it is more authentic than the Şahîh of al-Bukhârî. This is because he merely negated the existence of a book more authentic than the book of Muslim, since the negated fact here – by use of the term af'al – is a book similar to Muslim’s in authenticity. He did not negate the [possible] equality [of the two in terms of authenticity]. Similar to this is what has been reported from some scholars of the west (North Africa) in giving superiority to the Šahih of Muslim over the Šahih of al-Bukhārī. This [statement] refers to the good style, excellent placing and arrangement; no one has said that this superiority refers to its authenticity.

Commentary

In this detailed section, Ibn Ḥajar highlights how in the same way that the ‘most correct chains’ have certain superiority over reports that are void of this quality, a report mentioned by the two shaykhās al-Bukhārī and Muslim also have qualities of acceptance and preference. Two general statements are purported by Ibn Ḥajar;

a. A ḥadīth recorded by both al-Bukhārī and Muslim is preferred to a ḥadīth that is not recorded by anyone of them. This is because the scholars of ḥadīth have for long accepted

80 In answer to Abū ‘Alī al-Nisābūrī’s opinion, Ibn Ḥajar believes that his statement does not contradict the overwhelming opinion that al-Bukhārī is more authentic. Abū ‘Alī only negated that there is a more authentic book than Muslim. Hence he could mean that al-Bukhārī is the same as Muslim in terms of authenticity. Al-Suyūṭī provides a clear literary example to prove this grammatical point: ‘And that which indicates the customary usage of such quotes is the saying of Ḥāmid ibn Ḥanbal: ‘There is no one in Baṣra more learned than Bishr ibn Muḥammad. As for equal to him, then possibly’ (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 94). Also, al-‘Uthaymin adds that even if the opinion of Abū ‘Alī al-Nisābūrī was to be interpreted to mean that the book of Muslim alone was superior to all others – including the book of al-Bukhārī – then this would not affect the opinion of Ibn Ḥajar regarding the superiority of the Šahih of al-Bukhārī. This is because: ‘this is his own opinion on an issue…and when only one person has an opinion on an issue in contrast to what the majority say, then…it is not worthy of consideration’ (2002, 113).

81 As for the opinion expressed by the scholars of the Maghreb, Ibn Ḥajar writes that the superiority expressed is regarding the good layout, clear presentation and excellent arrangement of the chapters found in the Šahih of Muslim. Undoubtedly, Muslim has won many admirers for his clarity and simplicity. Al-‘Uthaymin expresses a commonly-held view when he writes that Muslim has arranged reports on a certain event or issue in a more accessible manner than al-Bukhārī has. This in addition to the excellent introduction Muslim wrote for his Šahih, something that is not found in the Šahih of al-Bukhārī (al-‘Uthaymin 2002, 113). However, there is no mention that this superiority is in terms of the greater soundness of the reports in the works of Muslim. Al-Suyūṭī writes:

‘Maslama ibn Qasim al-Qurtubī – from the generation of al-Daraquṭnī – said: ‘No one has compiled the likes of the Šahih of Muslim. And this is in terms of excellent placing and outstanding ordering, and not in terms of soundness’ (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 91).
the high standard and rigid methodology employed by these two scholars. A report mentioned by both is classified as muttafaq ‘alayh, or ‘agreed upon.’

b. Of the two scholars, the reports of al-Bukhārī in his Šahīḥ are deemed as more preferred than those of Muslim in his Šahīḥ.

In the next part of the text, he offers a comprehensive account on why the Šahīḥ of al-Bukhārī is preferred in general over the Šahīḥ of Muslim. The above text also indicates a common theme found in the Nuzhah. The author himself champions the preference of the Šahīḥ of al-Bukhārī, but he acknowledges the ikhtilāf surrounding this issue. Why this point is considered important will be discussed in detail in chapter six.

Were they to maintain [the claim], then the clear reality would refute them. For instance, the attributes upon which the soundness rotates is more complete and rigid in the book of al-Bukhārī than in the book of Muslim. His conditions in it are stronger and firmer. As for preferring al-Bukhārī in terms of the continuity [of the isnād], his condition is that the meeting of the reporter from whom he heard from must be proven, even if it is [only] once. Muslim merely depended on them being contemporaries. As a result, al-Bukhārī has been objected upon that he should be required not to accept mu‘an‘an at all. This objection directed upon him is not valid, because when the meeting of a narrator has been proven once, the possibility that he has not heard from him no longer exists. And if he has not heard from him, then it follows that he is a mudallis; and this matter is regarding other than the mudallis.82

82 Al-Bukhārī’s condition is that the reporter and the shaykh must have met, even if it was only once. Muslim says that being contemporaries is sufficient. A possible objection results from this difference in
As for his preference in terms of the credibility and accuracy of the reporters, the men who have been criticised from the men of Muslim are more in number than the men of al-Bukhārī, along with the fact that al-Bukhārī did not utilise them often. In fact, most of them are his own šaykhāt who he [directly] took from and was familiar with their reports. [This is] as opposed to Muslim in both matters. As for [al-Bukhārī’s] preference in terms of not being shādhdh or mu’allal, the reports of al-Bukhārī that have been criticised are less than the reports of Muslim that have been criticised. This along with the consensus of the scholars upon the fact that al-Bukhārī was more competent than Muslim in the disciplines, more learned in ḥadīth and that Muslim was his student and graduate who continued to take benefit from him and follow his steps. To the extent that al-Dāraquṭnī said: ‘If al-Bukhārī had not [existed], there would never have been Muslim.’

Commentary

In detail, Ibn Ḥajar offers evidence as to why the compilation of al-Bukhārī is considered more authentic than Muslim’s. He identifies four reasons; (i) in terms of the continuity of the isnād (ii) in terms of the credibility and accuracy of the reporters employed (iii) in terms of not being shādhdh or mu’allal (iv) in terms of knowledge and ability. With all four of these reasons, al-Bukhārī is stronger. For instance, in the Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim, there methodology: if al-Bukhārī maintains this stringent condition, then it necessitates that he should not accept a muʾanʾan ḥadīth at all. This is because with such a ḥadīth, the termʾan is used throughout as the word of delivery, and in some cases the meeting of the reporter with his šaykh is not proven. Ibn Ḥajar replies by dismissing such an objection. He writes that one it has proven that the reporter has met the person he is reporting from once, then the possibility that he has not heard from him no longer exists. If he does now narrate from him by using his name, though in fact he has not heard the particular report from him, then he is labelled a mudallis. (This is someone who changes the chain or text of the hadīth with malicious intent. This type will be covered later in section 5.21.) And here the question is regarding the muʾanʾan and not the mudallas ḥadīth. are more objected-upon narrators than there are in al-Bukhārī’s. Al-Suyūṭī elucidates when he writes that the number of reports that al-Bukhārī has used to the exclusion of Muslim are approximately 430 men. Of these, about eighty men are of dubious nature. Muslim on the other hand as used 720 reporters who have not been used by al-Bukhārī, of which 160 are reported to have some weakness (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 92). In general, the disputed narrations that are to be found in the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī and Muslim amount to approximately two hundred and ten; the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī only contains eighty from this number. Clearly, this highlights that the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī is more sound than the Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 93).

In section 5.7.1., we observed how Ibn Ḥajar considered the existence of a report in the works of al-Bukhārī and Muslim as an advantageous factor. The reason, he explained, was because of their piety, the scholars’ acceptance of their works and their academic ability. With precision, he mainly concentrates on this last reason here and shows why from the two grand masters of hadīth, al-Bukhārī is given preference. This point is important. The reason is that other Muslim scholars too have highlighted the exalted nature of al-Bukhārī and Muslim. But it seems they have ascribed this superiority to their piety, rather than their academic ability. Ibn Ḥajar’s analysis here focuses almost entirely on their academic ability, particularly that of al-Bukhārī’s. The Nuzhah systematically points to al-Bukhārī’s precision in rooting out the sound from the weak. On the other hand, others tend to remember his status as a good Muslim. Al-Suyūṭī writes:
The first compilation in only sound ḥadīth is the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī. And the reason for that is what Ibrāhīm ibn Ma‘qil al-Nasafī reports, who said: ‘We were with Ishāq ibn Rāhawayh and he said: ‘If you were to gather a brief book for the sound of the sunna of the Prophet ﷺ.’ Al-Bukhārī said: ‘Thus this thought occurred in my heart and I began to compile the compendium of the sound.’ He also said: ‘I saw the Prophet ﷺ [in a dream] as if I was standing over him and repelling [something] with a fan in my hand. And so I asked some experts in dreams about this. And they told me ‘you are repelling the lies from him.’ Hence this is what drove me to compile the compendium of the sound (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 88).

Al-Suyūṭī asks us to reflect on al-Bukhārī’s rank as a man who saw the Prophet in his dream, a man blessed with a divine touch. Ibn Ḥajar asks us to reflect on his excellent methodology and attention to detail. For Ibn Ḥajar, being a good Muslim is an asset in the field of ḥadīth but more important is being a great academic.

Why does this point matter? Simply because piety is not a guarantee against forgery. As we shall see later (in section 5.24.4), all Muslim scholars, including Ibn Ḥajar, admit that one of the main forgers in early Islam were the pious traditionists. The ḥadīth scholar Yahya ibn Sa‘īd (d. 198/813) said: ‘I have not witnessed lying about the Prophet more than I have seen it in those known for ascetism and piety’ (Brown 2009, 73). Ibn Ḥajar here accepts al-Bukhārī’s status but he ascribes it to his ability. This certainly shows his common sense and why the Nuzhah is important compared to other works on the discipline.
From this – namely from the aspect of the preference of al-Bukhārī’s conditions over others – the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī is preferred over others from the books written in ḥadīth; then the Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim, because of its coupling with al-Bukhārī in the agreement of the scholars of accepting their books, other than those which are muʿallal; then preferred in terms of soundness is that which complies with both of its conditions, because what is meant by this is their reporters with the present of their conditions. And the consensus has been reached in accepting their reporters as credible by the means of necessity; thus they are preferred over others. This is a principle that cannot be reversed except with evidence. If [the narration] complies with both of their conditions together, it will be less than what Muslim narrates or his likes. If [the narration] complies with one of their conditions, then the report that complies with al-Bukhārī alone is preferred over the one that complies with Muslim alone, following the principle for each. Thus, derived from this [account] are six types that differ in rank of soundness. Then there is a seventh type; and that is what complies with neither of their conditions, collectively and individually. And this ranking is merely in view of the aforementioned method. If, for instance, one type is preferred over another through a means which necessitates preference, then it is preceded, as sometimes a factor features which makes it higher in ranking. Like [for example] a ḥadīth with Muslim that is mashhūr though short from the stage of mutawātir, that possesses a factor which makes it give the benefit of knowledge; undoubtedly this is preferred to a ḥadīth that al-Bukhārī records alone. Similarly a ḥadīth that neither have recorded but has been deemed as the ‘most sound of chains’ like Mālik, from Nāfi’, from Ibn ‘Umar; for indeed this is preferred over that which only one of them records, especially when their isnād contains a reporter in which there is doubt.83

Commentary

Based on his analysis highlighting the exalted nature of al-Bukhārī and Muslim’s works, the author draws a general list of the compilations which are considered the most reliable. The order is;

1. That which both al-Bukhārī and Muslim record.
2. Al-Bukhārī.
3. Muslim.
4. That hadīth which complies with the condition of al-Bukhārī and Muslim.
5. That hadīth which complies with the condition of al-Bukhārī.
6. That hadīth which complies with the condition of Muslim.
7. That hadīth which complies with neither al-Bukhārī nor Muslim.

As a criticism, Ibn Ḥajar’s list here does not explain what the conditions of al-Bukhārī and Muslim were. The reason for the lack of explanation here is because they themselves were very abstract and vague about what conditions they laid down for a report to be considered ṣahīḥ. ‘Ajlān writes:

83 The author here means that this order is by no means exhaustive. If a strengthening factor or indication is found in a hadīth, then it will be preferred. For example, if a hadīth recorded by Muslim is mashhūr (but not mutawātir), but a factor is found which means it gives the benefit of al-ʿilm al-yaqīnī, then this is preferred to a narration from al-Bukhārī, when it is only fārd.
The scholars of this field are unanimous that al-Bukhārī and Muslim did not clarify in writing that ‘these are my conditions’. Their conditions have merely been outlined from later research [from other scholars] (1999, 63).

One cannot expect to utilise this list if one is unaware of what exactly the conditions of al-Bukhārī and Muslim were.

To conclude this section on ṣaḥīḥ, one cannot fail to notice the vast amount of literature and emphasis that Ibn Ḥajar gave here in the Nuzhah to the two Ṣaḥīḥs, in particular to al-Bukhārī’s superiority. In general, few Muslim scholars have dared to question their authority in the field and Ibn Ḥajar does not venture into this either.

The extensive analysis can be explained via different means. First, the lengthy discussion reflects his personal admiration for al-Bukhārī, which is shown elsewhere by his commentary on the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī, Fath al-bārī bi sharḥ ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī.

Secondly and perhaps more plausibly, the admiration for al-Bukhārī was really a result of the religious and academic climate of the ninth Islamic century. Brown notes:

Commentaries attained an important station in the late 1300s, when writing one on al-Bukhārī’s or Muslim’s Ṣaḥīḥ became the principal means for scholars throughout the Sunni Muslim world to interact with the ḥadīth tradition. At the peak of intellectual activity in Mamluk Cairo in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, almost every ḥadīth scholar or note wrote a commentary on Ṣaḥīḥ al-

Before, during and after Ibn Ḥajar’s time, writing a commentary on Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī was in fashion. Al-Kirmānī (d. 796), Ibn Kathīr (d. 774), al-Suyūṭī (d. 911), ‘Alā’ al-Dīn Mughulatāy (d. 792), al-Bulqīnī (d. 995), Ibn Rajab al-Ḥanbalī (d. 795) and Badr al-Dīn al-‘Aynī (d. 855) had all written commentaries on Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī. A strong defence of al-Bukhārī’s position was now required to defend this academic activity during this period. This is the reason why the Nuzhah gave such a strong backing to al-Bukhārī and Muslim, the former in particular. It also clearly shows how Ibn Ḥajar’s work was affected by the academic climate he resided in.

But this section – which praises the rank of al-Bukhārī and Muslim – does raise an important question. Clearly, the starting point for reliable, authentic ḥadīth literature in Ibn Ḥajar’s mind is the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī and the Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim. If this is true, then what does this say about the vast ḥadīth literature that preceded these two grand shaykhs? We could interpret this as an acknowledgement from Ibn Ḥajar that the early ṣaḥīḥas were not reliable, or that the Muwatā’ of Mālik was not truly a ḥadīth compilation. The emphasis on al-Bukhārī’s methodology in sifting the sound from the forged could indeed suggest that Ibn Ḥajar believed this was ineffective prior to him.
5.10. Ḣasan.

If the accuracy is lighter – namely less; it is said khaffa al-qawm khufūf, when it decreases – and what is meant here is with the presence of the remaining aforementioned conditions in the definition of ṣaḥīḥ, then this is Ḣasan li-dhātih, and not by other. Ḣasan is a report whose [grade of] fairness is because of compensating factors, like, for example, a mastūr ḥadīth when its paths become numerous. By mentioning the remaining conditions of [ṣaḥīḥ], the weak is excluded. This type of Ḣasan is synonymous to ṣaḥīḥ in terms of usage as evidence, though it is less than it [in rank]. It is [also] synonymous to it in its division into ranks, some above others. And with numerous chains, it becomes sound. It is declared as sound with more chains because the collective form now has a power by which the lack of accuracy of the fair narrator is compensated for. Then [the term] sound is called upon the chain which is Ḣasan li-dhātih, when the chains become numerous. And this is [only] when the attribute is solitary.

After a comprehensive account of the sound, ṣaḥīḥ, the author identifies Ḣasan, and in particular Ḣasan li-dhātih. This is identical to ṣaḥīḥ in all aspects but one. Whereas the accuracy of the narrator in ṣaḥīḥ is expected to be of the highest calibre, Ḣasan li-dhātih is where the accuracy can be somewhat lighter, or less. Therefore the difference between ṣaḥīḥ and Ḣasan is trivial rather than fundamental.

Nothing more is said on the issue of Ḣasan in the Nuzhah. The rest of the section on this type is devoted to a problem regarding the terminology of al-Tirmidhī, which he employed in his Sunan.
Thus if they both gather, namely šahīh and ḥasan in one description; like the saying of al-Tirmidhī and others: ‘[this is a] ḥasan šahīh ḥadīth’, then this results in confusion for the mujtahid in its transmission. Does it entail the conditions of šahīh or not? This is the case when the report in question is solitary. And it will be clarified in this [discussion] the answer to those who deem it difficult to reconcile between the two attributes and who say ‘ḥasan is less than šahīh’ like it is known from each of the definitions. So in gathering the two attributes is an affirmation for that shortcoming and its negation.

Commentary

Here Ibn Ḥajar tackles the long-standing debate regarding al-Tirmidhī’s (d. 279/892) unique terminology used in his Sunan. As it has been identified, there is a marked difference between šahīh and ḥasan. In the former, the accuracy of the narrator is of the highest standard, whereas with the latter, there is more leniency permitted. In his Sunan, al-Tirmidhī transmits a report and usually follows it with a statement regarding its rank in ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. For example, he will say ‘this is a sound ḥadīth’ or ‘this is a fair ḥadīth.’ However, there are several places where one solitary ḥadīth will be described as being ‘ḥasan šahīh’, ‘ḥasan gharīb’ or so on. This results in confusion; how can one narration be described as being sound and fair simultaneously? The problem is amplified when the particular narration in question only has one variant. Referring to a ḥadīth as both šahīh and ḥasan proves its accuracy and disproves it.84

84 Implicitly, Ibn Ḥajar acknowledges that though al-Tirmidhī is the most famous scholar to refer to one report with two descriptions, he is not the only one to do so. In the text, Ibn Ḥajar writes ‘like the saying of al-Tirmidhī and others.’ Al-Munāwī clarifies that other scholars who declared reports as ‘ḥasan šahīh’, The summary of the answer [to this] is that it is required from the mujtahid not to describe it with one attribute [to the exclusion of the other]. Thus it can be said ‘hasan’ with consideration of its attribute according to one community, ‘ṣahīḥ’ with consideration of its attribute according to another community. The conclusion of this is that the particle of doubt (i.e. ‘or’) has been omitted. This is because he should have said ‘ḥasan or ṣahīḥ’. This is similar to how the particle of conjunction has been omitted from the type described after this.
Upon this [basis], that which is described as being ‘ḥasan ṣahīḥ’ is less in rank than that in which is described as ‘ṣahīḥ’, because conviction is stronger than doubt. This is when the report is solitary. When it is not, namely when the narration is not solitary, then the calling of two attributes simultaneously on one report is done according to it possessing two chains; one of them is ṣahīḥ and the other is ḥasan.
And upon this [basis], that which is described as being ‘ḥasan ṣahīḥ’ is higher in rank than that in which is described as ‘ṣahīḥ’ only when it is fard, because numerous chains strengthens [the report’s validity].

If it is said that al-Tirmidhî has clarified that the condition of ḥasan is that it is narrated by more than one path, then how can he say in some reports, ‘ḥasan gharîb, we do not know of it except by this path’? The answer is that al-Tirmidhî did not define ḥasan in general; he merely defined it specifically for his book. This is for

‘ḥasan gharîb’ and so on were the likes of Ya‘qûb ibn Shayba, Ibn al-Madînî and Abû ‘Alî al-Ţûsî, in his
In his reply, Ibn ɬHajar begins by stating that an observer cannot simply say that one term (from ḥasan, ṣahîh and gharîb) is applicable to the exclusion of the others. There must be a reason by al-Tirmidhî chose to declare a certain report as ‘ḥasan ṣahîh’ rather than just ‘ḥasan’ or ‘ṣahîh’. This is proven by the fact that there are countless reports in his Sunan that are declared as ‘ḥasan’ only or ‘ṣahîh’ only.
when the report is ‘ḥasan’ without another attribute [attached to it]. In [describing] some reports, he says ‘ḥasan’ and in some ‘ṣaḥīḥ’ and in some ‘gharīb’ and in some ‘ḥasan ṣaḥīḥ’ and in some ‘ḥasan gharīb’ and in some ‘ḥasan ṣaḥīḥ gharīb’. His definition [of ḥasan] only applied to the first (ḥasan). His writings suggest that when he said at the end of his book:

And a ḥadīth described as ḥasan in our book, we merely intend it to mean ḥasan in terms of its chain according to us. Every ḥadīth which is narrated by people who have not been accused of lying, and is narrated by more than one chain of its like, and is not shādhdhī, this is considered as ḥasan according to us.

Hence it is deduced from this that he only defined that ḥadīth which is called ‘ḥasan’ only. As for that for which he says ‘ḥasan ṣaḥīḥ’ or ‘ḥasan gharīb’ or ‘ḥasan ṣaḥīḥ gharīb’ he did not indulge in its definition, like he did not indulge in the definition of ‘ṣaḥīḥ’ only or ‘gharīb’ only. It is as if he left out defining these because of lack of need, as they were known by the people of this discipline. He sufficed on the definition of ‘ḥasan’ only either because of its ambiguity or because it was a new terminology. And that is why he added ‘according to us’ to his definition and he did not ascribe it [universally] to the people of ḥadīth, just as al-Khaṭṭābī did.

With this analysis many objections that lengthen the discussion and do not lead to a prefential view are repelled. So for Allāh is praise upon what He has inspired and taught.
Ibn Ḥajar adopts great detail and clarity in explaining the apparent confusion resulting from al-Tirmidhī’s unique usage of technical terms. But it is not an academic answer, but rather a practical and easy one. In essence, Ibn Ḥajar gives two answers. The first answer offered regards those reports that have only one variant. Quite simply, al-Tirmidhī may have meant to say ‘ḥasan or ṣaḥīḥ’; that according to one set of scholars, the report in question has been declared ‘ḥasan’ whereas another set of scholars have declared it as ‘ṣaḥīḥ’.

The second answer is where the report in question has two variants. Ibn Ḥajar believes that if a particular report is declared as ‘ḥasan ṣaḥīḥ’, then this means that according to one chain, the report is ‘ḥasan’ and according to the other chain, it is ‘ṣaḥīḥ’. Again, this is perhaps a display of shorthandness from al-Tirmidhī since he should have said ‘ḥasan and ṣaḥīḥ’.

The Nuzhah’s outline of this debate raises some crucial points worthy of closer analysis.

a. Ibn Ḥajar’s lengthy-analysis suggests that he desired the Nuzhah to be an arbitrator and clarifier of difficult terminologies. Perhaps this gives us an indication that the text was not aimed at experts in the field, but for the new disciples. It was a guide for readers to alert them of terms they would come across as their reading and research developed.

b. Ibn Ḥajar does not question the terms used by al-Tirmidhī such as ḥasan ṣaḥīḥ. If they are confusing, it is because we do not understand them, not because of any deficiency in al-Tirmidhī. The task of scholars like Ibn Ḥajar is to make sense of the works of the previous greats, not to question their work. Owing to his seniority in the field, al-Tirmidhī is protected by later scholars like Ibn Ḥajar.

c. Having said this, Ibn Ḥajar is perhaps admitting the Sunan of al-Tirmidhī does contain weaker reports, in relation to the works of al-Bukhārī and Muslim. This is because he interprets ‘ḥasan ṣaḥīḥ’ as possibly meaning ‘ḥasan or ṣaḥīḥ’. In other words, the scholars are divided as to whether the report has reached a sound standard. This is the opinion that Goldziher reached. Because the aim was to gather a ‘proof or argument for a lawyer in legal practice’, the Sunan of al-Tirmidhī was much more liberal (1971, 231) and the transmitters used were either weak or too distant (in time or place) to have heard from one another. This, Goldziher writes, led to this new classification of reports using terms such as ḥasan ṣaḥīḥ (1971, 232). What this shows is that there are occasions when the findings of Muslim scholars and non-Muslim ones are similar. Despite this, Muslims tend to belittle the observations and research of the non-Muslims. Why this occurs will be taken up in detail in section six.

d. Upon concluding the discussion explaining the difficulty in interpreting al-Tirmidhī’s terminology, Ibn Ḥajar praises his own analysis. He writes that the Nuzhah here has repelled ‘many objections that lengthen the discussion and do not lead to views of preference’ and therefore ‘for Allāh is praise upon what He has inspired and taught.’
Ironically though, Ibn Ḥajar has merely plagiarized the views of his predecessors in explaining al-Tirmidhī’s terminology. The majority of the views aired are from his predecessors; he only amalgamated and edited the opinions of other scholars. Al-Munāwī notes:
And this, all of it, is an amalgamation of three answers; from Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ, Ibn Daqīq al-ʿĪd and Ibn Kathīr. And the author [Ibn Ḥajar] merely gathered, ordered and summarised it. (1999, 1: 407-8)

5.10.1. Conclusion.

This final point needs closer deliberation. If, as al-Munāwī notes, Ibn Ḥajar merely re-wrote the views of his predecessors on the terminology of al-Tirmidhī, we need to establish why this happened. Two possible reasons are plausible here.

a. The intellectual climate of Ibn Ḥajar’s time.

In short, academic originality had dried up by the time of Ibn Ḥajar in the ninth Islamic century. The period of ḥadīth compilation had ceased centuries ago and was replaced by an era of consolidation and analysis. New work was in reality the work of the predecessors arranged in a different matter. We have the compilation of Zayn al-Dīn al-Zābidī (d. 893/1488) called Tajrīd al-ṣaḥīh, a small one-volume digest of all the reports to be found in the Ṣaḥīh of al-Bukhārī (Brown 2009, 57). Then there is the attempt to amass all of the ḥadīth corpus into one book by al-Suyūṭī, which he called Jamʿ al-jawāmi’. In such a climate, new, original ideas and approaches were the exception, not the norm. In this particular section on al-Tirmidhī’s terminology, the Nuzhah too has fallen victim to this apathy.

The similarities between the Nuzhah and Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ’s Muqaddima are quite blatant in places. For example, the latter wrote:

‘The statement of al-Tirmidhī and others, ‘this is a fair and sound ḥadīth’ is problematic because the fair ḥadīth is inferior to the sound, as was explained above. The conjunction of these two states in a single ḥadīth is the conjunction of the negation and assertion of this inferiority. The answer here is that the expression concerns the chain. When a single ḥadīth is related with two chains, one of them fair and the other sound, it may be properly called a ‘fair and sound ḥadīth’; that is, it is fair in relation to one chain and sound in relation to the other’ (1986, 39).
b. The lack of copyright laws.

If Ibn Ḥajar was guilty of copying the works of his predecessors, it was because there was nothing stopping him from doing so. There were no laws or agreements to prevent plagiarism. Goldziher notes:

Oriental authors always accepted much latitude in respect of literary ownership. An index of plagiarists would contain many important names...In the seventh century, ‘Imād al-Dīn b. al-Athīr simply copied the historical commentary of Ibn Badrūn and passed the work off as his own without even mentioning the true author (1971, 246).

There is no reason why both these points could have been applicable to the time of Ibn Ḥajar. Importantly, the observations of Goldziher are important to adding to our understanding of the Nuzhah and in fact, are not radically different to that of Ibn Ḥajar. The Nuzhah suggests that al-Tirmidhī’s innovative terminology suggested some degree of weakness and this is the same conclusion that Goldziher reached. The difference is in the perception. Because most Muslims have already made their mind up about Goldziher, his views are rejected as blasphemous, even if they converge with respected Muslim scholars like Ibn Ḥajar. A genuine appreciation of Goldziher cannot be made if al-Sibā‘ī describes him as ‘the most dangerous of the Orientalists, the one with the longest hand, the most evil and corruptive in this field...’ (1998, 213). So in search of a better appreciation of ‘ilm al-hadīth, knowledge as a universal entity needs to be respected, not just Muslim knowledge.
5.10.2. The Addition of Reliable Narrators.

The addition of their narrators, namely ḥasan and ṣaḥīḥ, is accepted so long as it does not contradict the narration of someone more authoritative who has not mentioned that addition. [This is] because the addition is either such that it does not contradict between it and between the report that does not mention it. Thus this is generally accepted, because it is like the principle of a solitary ḥadīth which an authoritative narrator has reported alone and no one else reports it from his shaykh. Or either it contradicts it in the sense that accepting this one will necessitate rejecting the other narration. Thus this is the one in which comparison is required between it and the one opposing it; so the more preferred will be accepted and the other will be rejected.

There is a famous opinion from the scholars that the addition is unequivocally accepted without detail. This [opinion] cannot make sense from the [same] ḥadīth scholars who identify the condition in ṣaḥīḥ that it must not be ṣhadḥdh. They then define ṣhadḥdh as the opposition of a reliable narrator of someone more authoritative. It is surprising to see such negligence from them though they accept the condition in ṣaḥīḥ of not being ṣhadḥdh, as well as in ḥasan. Examination of the addition when deciding its worth has been transmitted from the classical ḥadīth masters, like ‘Abd al-Raḥmān ibn Mahdī (d. 198/814), Yaḥyā al-Qaṭṭān (d. 198/813), Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal (d. 241/855), Yaḥyā ibn Maʿīn (d. 233/847), ‘Alī ibn al-Madīnī (d. 234/848), al-Bukhārī (d. 256/870), Abū Zurʿa al-Rāzī (d. 264/877), Ibn Abī Ḥātim (d. 327/938), al-Nasāʿī (d. 303/915), al-Dāraquṭnī (d. 375/985) and others. It is not known from any of them to accept the addition unequivocally.
More surprising is the opinion of some Shāfi‘ī scholars who unequivocally accept the addition, though the text of al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī indicates otherwise. For indeed he said, when describing the state of a narrator’s accuracy, that:

…and when one of the ḥāfīzs share the report he does not oppose them. If it does, and the ḥadīth is shorter, then this is proof upon the authenticity of the source of the ḥadīth. And when it is not shorter [but exists some other shortcoming] then this proves the inaccuracy of the ḥadīth.

The [text] stipulates that when the report contradicts another and it is longer, this can harm the [authenticity of the] ḥadīth. This indicates that the addition of a reliable narrator according to him does not necessitate acceptance unconditionally; merely it is accepted from the ḥāfīz. For he has considered [and preferred] the shorter ḥadīth than the ḥadīth of the one he opposes from the ḥāfīzs; and he has made the shortcomings of this narrator’s ḥadīth evidence of its authenticity since it indicates precaution. Then he has made what is other than that harmful for the ḥadīth. So if it was accepted unequivocally according to him, it would not be harmful for the narrator of the ḥadīth.\(^{87}\)

\(^{87}\) Al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī writes, when describing the state of a narrator’s accuracy, that a narration is accepted when a narrator does not oppose the ḥāfīzs. If it does, and the ḥadīth is shorter, then this is proof of the authenticity of the source of the ḥadīth. Al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī means that when a narrator has a longer narration, then this is sometimes harmful for the ḥadīth. What this thus proves that al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī did not accept the additions unequivocally, but only from the ḥāfīzs. He considers that the ḥadīth must be shorter for it to be accepted, as it is a sign of more precaution. If al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī believed that additions are accepted unconditionally, then the addition would not have been rejected.
Commentary

Ibn Ḥajar explains the principle of ziyādat al-thiqā, or the addition of reliable narrators. When extra words sometimes occur in a ḥasan or saḥīḥ ḥadīth, then they are accepted as long as they do not oppose the narrations of those who are more authoritative (who have not mentioned these extra words). Two possible cases can result, both which are clearly explained in the Nuzhah.

This section gives considerable emphasis to the dispute surrounding the issue. Ibn Ḥajar here refutes those scholars who claim that the extra words of narration will be accepted unconditionally, without explanation or detail. He does so via two means. Firstly, he reminds readers that the established definition of saḥīḥ states that the ḥadīth must not be shādhdh. Shādhdh is when an authoritative narrator is opposed by a more authoritative narrator. Secondly, he lists names of esteemed scholars who were of the opinion that the extra words are not accepted unconditionally. This suggests that Ibn Ḥajar saw their opinions as trustworthy evidence. This shows that for the author, there are two ways of supporting an argument in ḥadīth studies; through empirical means and through referring the matter to the opinion of esteemed scholars in the field. It reminds the reader of the role seniority plays in this discipline. It is also an indication that the Nuzhah’s task was not only to present the overwhelming opinion on a matter, but also to alert the reader of minority views too.
5.11. \textit{Shādhdh} & maḥfūẓ- The Preserved and the Anomalous.

Thus if it is opposed (i.e. the narrator of a ḥasan or ṣaḥīḥ), because [in contrast] a narration is to be found which has more accuracy in the narrator, or more in number or other reasons of preference are found, then the preferred is called \textit{maḥfūẓ} and the rejected is called \textit{shādhdh}. An example is that [narration] which al-Imām al-Tirmidhī, al-Nasāʾī and Ibn Māja recorded from Ibn ʿUyayna, from ʿAmr ibn Dīnār from ʿAwsaja from Ibn ʿAbbās that `a man passed away in the time of the Prophet \(\mathcal{H}\) and did not leave a heir except for a slave which he had freed…’ \(\textsuperscript{88}\)

\textit{Mutābaʿa} \(\textsuperscript{89}\) has been done for its continuation for Ibn ʿUyayna by Ibn Jurayj and others. Ḥammād ibn Zayd has opposed this narration as he narrated it from ʿAmr ibn Dīnār from ʿ Awsaja and did not mention Ibn ʿAbbās. Ibn Abī Ἅṭim said ‘the ḥadīth of Ibn ʿUyayna is \textit{maḥfūẓ}.’ So Ḥammād ibn Zayd is from the narrators of accuracy and trustworthiness; despite this Ibn Abī Ἅṭim gave preference to the narration which has more numbers. It is thus deduced from this explanation that \textit{shādhdh} is where an accepted narrator is opposed by someone more authoritative. This is the established definition of \textit{shādhdh} according to [ḥadīth] terminology.

\(\textsuperscript{88}\) The text of Ibn Ῥajār only mentions part of the ḥadīth. The full report is; ‘A man died and did not leave a heir except for a slave he had freed. The Prophet asked, ‘Does the man have anyone?’ They said, ‘No, except the slave for him that he had freed.’ So the Prophet made the inheritance for him.’ This has been recorded by Abī Dāwūd, al-Tirmidhī and Ibn Māja.

\(\textsuperscript{89}\) This is the process of finding a similar supporting chain for a ḥadīth. The explanation is provided later in section 5.13.
In this brief section, the author explains the difference between shādhdh and mahfūz. The former is where an authoritative narrator’s report is not accepted, either because a more authoritative narrator opposes him (by reporting the isnād or matn differently), or because a report more in number is to be found. The latter is the name given to the report that in contrast is accepted.

The example offered by Ibn Ḥajar in the Nuzhah (of Ḥammād ibn Zayd) relates to shādhdh according to the chain. However, a report can be considered shādhdh by virtue of the matn (text), which is then called shādhdh al-matn. Abū Dāwūd and al-Tirmidhī have narrated from the ḥadīth of ‘Abd al-Wāḥid ibn Ziyād, from al-A‘mash, from Abū al-Ṣāliḥ, from Abū Hurayra, that the Prophet  said:

> When one of you performs the two units of fajr [prayer], he should then lie down on his right side.

Bayhaqī writes that this version of ‘Abd al-Wāḥid opposes many authoritative narrators. This is because they have recorded this as an action of the Prophet, rather than his saying. Therefore this particular version of ‘Abd al-Wāḥid is deemed as shādhdh (Mīghālwī 2003, 437).90

90 Likewise there is a report in which the Prophet said: ‘The days of tashrīq are the days of eating and drinking.’ Mūsā ibn ‘Alī ibn Rbāh - from his father, from ‘Uqba ibn ‘Āmir – added the words ‘and the day of ‘Arafa’ too. But because all reports exclude this addition, it is considered as shādhdh and thus is not accepted.
5.11.1. Conclusion.

It has already mentioned (in section 5.9) that the definition of a ṣahīḥ report almost exclusively centres on the isnād to the exclusion of the matn. One of the conditions of a ṣahīḥ report is that it must not be shādhīh. Ibn Ḥajar only explained shādhīh al-isnād here with an example and did not elucidate at all on shādhīh al-matn. Implicitly, this suggests that even shādhīh mainly relates to the isnād and not the matn. The analysis of shādhīh and mahfūz shows the dependency on men as well as the importance of seniority in the field; a higher authority is automatically ‘preserved’ and the less-renowned one is rejected.

Moreover, shādhīh also highlights the lack of clarity in the definition of ṣahīḥ. We are informed that a ṣahīḥ report must not be shādhīh, but there is a difference of opinion as to what exactly shādhīh is. For instance, it is said that shādhīh is a report that only has one isnād, which is reported solitarily by an authoritative shaykh. Others have understood by the term ‘shādhīh’ (which literally means ‘alone’) that this refers to a report that has only been reported by one authoritative narrator. Even Ibn Ḥajar seems to accept the variety of definitions by writing that his view on shādhīh is ‘the established definition’, thus suggesting that variations do exist.

Despite this, most scholars after him do accept the definition offered by Ibn Ḥajar. This itself suggests his authority in the field. So in essence, shādhīh is where an authoritative reporter is opposed by someone who is more authoritative. Otherwise, the ḥadīth ‘actions are judged merely by intentions’ would be considered as shādhīh and no Muslim scholar adheres to this opinion.
5.12. Ma‘rūf & munkar- the Familiar and the Unfamiliar.

If the opposition occurs with the weak [reporter], then the preferred is called ma‘rūf and the opposing one is called munkar. Its example is that which is reported by Ibn Abī Ḥātim from Ḥubbayb ibn Ḥabīb, the brother of Ḥamza ibn Ḥabīb al-Zayyāt al-Muqrī, from Abū İṣḥāq, from al-İzzār ibn ハウスay th from Ibn ‘Abbās from the Prophet who said: ‘Whoever performs Prayer, gives zakāt, performs the ḥajj, fasts and is hospitable to guests, will enter Paradise.’

Ibn Abī Ḥātim said: ‘This tradition is munkar because others from the reliable narrators have recorded the tradition as being from Abū İṣḥāq only, [and not up to the Prophet]. This is the ma‘rūf narration.’

It is known from this that between shādhdh and munkar is [a relation of] ‘umūm wa-khusūṣ min wajh, because between them there is similarity in terms of opposition and there is difference in that shādhdh is the narration of an authoritative or truthful and munkar is the narration of a weak. Ignorant are those who made them synonymous. And Allāh knows best.

Commentary

Following the discussion on shādhdh and mahfūz, Ibn Ḥajar refers to ma‘rūf and munkar in this section. The reason for this is because there is a close resemblance between the two. Whereas shādhdh is the report of a reliable narrator being opposed by those who are

92 Because of the similarity between shādhdh and munkar, Ibn Ḥajar describes the relationship between the two as one of ‘umūm wa-khusūṣ min wajh. This means that they in some form, they share some similarity and in some form it does not. Shādhdh and munkar are similar in the sense that both involve the rejection of the report because of the existence of a higher authority or because of more numbers. They are different because the reporter of the shādhdh is deemed reliable (thiqāt) whereas the reporter of the munkar is weak.
more reliable or more in number, munkar is where the report of a weak narrator is being opposed by someone who is more reliable.

At the end of the discussion on ma’rûf and munkar, Ibn Ḥajar shows his dismay to the scholars who do not differentiate between shādhdh and munkar when he comments, ‘And ignorant are those who made them synonymous.’ The target of his criticism is Ibn al-Ṣalâḥ, though he does not mention him by name. In his ‘Ulûm al-ḥadîth, he divides munkar into two types; (i) the isolated ḥadîth (munfarad) which contradicts what the reliable transmitters relate (ii) the isolated ḥadîth (fard) in which the transmitter does not possess the reliability and exactitude to narrate by himself (1986, 80, 82). Clearly, neither of these definitions comply with the one offered by Ibn Ḥajar.

Perhaps the criticism of Ibn Ḥajar is somewhat severe; this is because not all ḥadîth scholars adhere to the given definition of munkar. In fact Ibn Ḥajar himself acknowledges that the term has divided scholars. Later in the Nuzhah, he defines munkar as:

> The ḥadîth in which the chain is a reporter whose mistakes are common, or his negligence is severe or his lewdness (fisq) is apparent (section 5.26.)

Mighálwî cites the opinion who Ḥâfîẓ Abû Bakr Bardîjî from al-Wâsiṭ who defines munkar as:

> The ḥadîth whose matn is not known except from its [lone] reporter (2003, 431).
By the time of Ibn Ḥajar, the majority of the technical terms used in the discipline were harmonised. Munkar is one of the few exceptions. What can also be deduced from this section is that purpose of the Nuzhah is also to analyse contrasting definitions on a particular hadīth terminology and offer the correct or most-trusted opinion on it. This is seen with munkar as well as with shādhīh and iʿtibār (which is explained in the next section). Finally, the fact that Ibn Ḥajar singled out Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ for criticism also shows that he saw his work as the benchmark and standard-marker in the discipline. This criticism here regarding munkar and shādhīh is hardly devastating. But perhaps Ibn Ḥajar felt the need to mention it to show how his own Nuzhah did not merely copy the views of those before him, but did in fact introduce new ideas and correct previous mistakes.

5.13. Mutābiʿ, shāhid & iʿtibār- the Parallelisms, the Attestations and the Analysis.

[With regards to] what has been mentioned regarding fard nisbī; if it is found – after assuming that it was solitary – that others have agreed with it, then this is mutābiʿ, with a kasra on the bāʿ. Mutābaʿa has stages; if the agreement is with the [original] narrator, then it is [called] tāmma. And if it occurs for his shaykh or whoever is below him, thus it is qāṣira. The benefit of this is strengthening. The example of mutābaʿa tāmma is that which al-Imām al-Shāfīʿī narrated in al-Umm, from Mālik, from ʿAbd Allāh ibn Dīnār, from Ibn ʿUmar that the Messenger of Allāh said: ‘The month is twenty-nine days. Thus do not fast until you see the crescent [of the moon] and do not cease [the fasts] until you see it. Therefore if it is cloudy upon you, then complete (fa-akmilū) the period [of] thirty.’ So this ḥadīth with these words, a group thought that al-Shāfi‘ī was alone in narrating it from Mālik, thus counting it as one of his gharībs (solitary reports). This is because the companions of Mālik have transmitted from him with the word ‘therefore if it is cloudy upon you, then count (faqdirū la-hū) for it.’ But we have found a mutābi‘ for [the report of] al-Shāfi‘ī. And this is ‘Abd Allāh ibn Maslama al-Qa‘nabī – this is how al-Bukhārī has recorded it – from Mālik. This is mutāba‘a tāmma. We have also found for it mutāba‘a qāsira in the Ṣaḥīḥ of Ibn Khuzayma, from the narration of ‘Āṣim ibn Muḥammad, from his father Muḥammad ibn Zayd, from his grandfather ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Umar, with the word ‘thus complete (fa-kammilū) thirty.’ And [also] in the Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim from the narration of ‘Ubayd Allāh ibn ‘Umar, from Nāfī‘, from Ibn ‘Umar with the word ‘thus count (faqdirū) thirty.’ In this mutāba‘a, there is no condition that the exact words [are mentioned], regardless of whether it is tāmma or qāsira. Rather, if it is transmitted with [mere] meaning, it is sufficient, though the condition is that it is from that [same] Companion.

If a matn is found that is narrated from another Companion that resembles it in wording and meaning, or meaning alone, then this is shāhid. The example is al-Nasā‘ī’s version of the same ḥadīth which we have mentioned, from the narration of Muḥammad ibn Jubayr, from Ibn ‘Abbās, from the Prophet ﷺ; thus he mentioned the likes of the ḥadīth of ‘Abd Allāh ibn Dīnār, from Ibn ‘Umar equally. This is in terms of wording. As for in terms of meaning, then it is that which al-Bukhārī has reported, from the narration of Muḥammad ibn Ziyād, from Abū Hurayra with the words: ‘therefore if it is cloudy upon you, then complete the period of Sha‘bān thirty.’

A group [of scholars] have specified mutāba‘a with that [report] which occurs [the same] in wording, regardless of whether it is from that [same] Companion or not, and that shāhid is that [report] which occurs [the same] in meaning. Moreover sometimes mutāba‘a is applied to shāhid, and vice versa. The matter in it is easy.93

Know that the examining of chains, from the jāmi‘s, the musnads and the juz‘s, to know whether that ḥadīth which was assumed to be solitary does in fact have a mutābi‘ is called ʻitibār. The statement of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ ‘Knowing the ʻitibār, the mutāba‘āt and the shawāhid; some have assumed that ʻitibār is a division like the [other] two. That is not the case; rather it is the means of attaining the two.94 The benefit of the division of everything that has passed from the types of the accepted is preference when there is conflict. And Allāh knows best.

Here, Ibn Ḥajar introduces three technical terms; mutābi‘, shāhid and ʻitibār. In essence, these are not terms used for describe a ḥadīth per se, rather they are terms used to

93 Ibn Ḥajar is aware of the different definitions that exist for mutābi‘ and shāhid. Some scholars have said that mutābi‘ is when the agreement occurs in terms of the words, regardless of whether the Companion is different or not. Shāhid is where the agreement occurs in terms of the meaning, regardless of whether the Companion is the same or not. Others have inverted the definition of both. Ibn Ḥajar dismisses the importance of the exact definition of each (when he writes the matter in it is easy) because both mutābi‘ and shāhid serve exactly the same purpose; to strengthen reports that are first deemed solitary.

94 Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ wrote as a sub-heading in his book ‘Knowing the ʻitibār, the mutābi‘āt and the shawāhid.’ Some people have understood from this text that ʻitibār is a type of ḥadīth, though this is not the case. In fact it is the means and process by which we discover mutābi‘ and shāhid. In defence of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ, it must be mentioned that he merely mentioned this as a sub-heading for the fifteenth type, and his actual writings in the section do not indicate a failure to understand that ʻitibār is the name given to the means of investigation (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, pp. 82-85). In fact, al-Suyūṭī uses exactly the same words (‘Knowing the ʻitibār, the mutābi‘āt and the shawāhid’) in the sub-heading of his ‘ilm al-ḥadīth manual, Tadrīb (1972, 1: 241).
describe the resulting outcome when scholars attempt to find supporting narrations for a solitary report.

Considerable emphasis is given by Ibn Ḥajar to this section. It is one of the few places in the Nuzhah where he cites a ḥadīth with its full chain of narration. This very fact reflects his maturity as a teacher and writer; the reason being that mutābiʿ, shāhid and iʿtibār is perhaps best understood through a practical example.

Implicitly, we deduce four things from this section. Firstly, Ibn Ḥajar is accepting that a fard (solitary) report is deficient in ʿilm al-ḥadīth. If it was not, then there would be no need to indulge in the practice of iʿtibār to find supporting narrations. The section here only suggests a need for seeking supporting narrations for a solitary report, not a mashhūr or ʿazīz one.

Yet at the same time, the section also suggests that Ibn Ḥajar wanted to highlight the strength and authenticity of ḥadīth literature. This is because the process of iʿtibār helps to find support for existing material. The chain Nāfiʿ from Ibn ʿUmar is cited as an example in the Nuzhah. By finding supporting chains for it from other Companions (Ibn ʿAbbās & Abū Hurayra), a case can now be made for its authenticity. So the author uses the section, with a detailed example, to show what tools the ḥadīth masters had at their disposals to vouch for existing solitary reports.

Thirdly, this section indicates the direction ḥadīth studies did take on by this period though. By the ninth Islamic century, finding new, undiscovered ḥadīths was not possible. The aim was of iʿtibār was to support and authenticate existing reports and perhaps more importantly, promote weak and solitary reports to acceptable levels through corroborative research. This is turn would extend the pool of resources scholars of that period could work from. It is here we see a marked difference between Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ and Ibn Ḥajar in terms of methodology. The former was of the opinion that ‘these days, it is no longer feasible for someone to apprehend sound ḥadīth on his own merely examining isnāds’ (1986, 25). This was because of the decline in reporter standards by his time. By Ibn Ḥajar’s time, the reporter standards must have worsened much more, but he was of the opinion that a qualified scholar could authenticate ḥadīth material not previously authenticated. I‘tibār could help immensely in this respect. When Dickinson wrote that the abstract mechanism of collective acumen replaced the reliability of the individual transmitters as the guarantor of the authenticity of ḥadīth texts in later times (2002, 488), he was referring to mechanisms such as i‘tibār.

Thirdly, by outlining mutābi‘, shāhid and i‘tibār in detail, Ibn Ḥajar is suggesting that knowing the different research techniques was important, even in the ninth Islamic century. Rather than passively accepting the knowledge gathered by the ḥadīth masters of the past, the Nuzhah here suggests that new research in the field – finding supporting narrations and re-checking the paths – was indeed still desired and possible. In short, he wanted to show ḥadīth studies still mattered, even in the ninth Islamic century. However, the reality was that fresh-thinking and original research was rare during the time of Ibn Ḥajar. Most of Ibn Ḥajar’s own literature was based on earlier works, in the form of commentaries, compilations and collections. New research was an exception rather than the norm. Instead, the serious and academic form of ḥadīth studies was viewed as dull and hardly thought-provoking in his time. Makdisi notes:
The atmosphere of a classroom of a ḥadīth differed dramatically from that of a classroom on law. Ḥadīths were copied word for word from dictation. The process was tedious and dull. Teachers of ḥadīth were praised in biographical notices for their patience. Notices mention the complaints of teachers regarding the bad behaviour of students in class, talking and distracting other students: no doubt because some took dictation faster than others, and ḥadīth classes were usually much more crowded than law classes (1981, 115).

This contrasted with law classes, which was marked by ‘controversy, argumentation and debate’ (Makdisi 1981, 115).

Owing to such a climate, it is feasible to suggest that the section here on mutābi’, shāhid and iʿtibār was an appeal from Ibn Ḥajar that ḥadīth studies could still be engaging, thought-provoking and interesting in the Mamluk period. In short, that ḥadīth studies still mattered.

5.14. & 5.15. Muḥkam (the Clear) and the mukhtalif al-ḥadīth (the Contradictory Tradition)

Then the accepted can also be divided into the acted upon and the non-acted upon. This [division exists] because if it is immune from opposition – in the sense that a report contradicting it does not appear – then it is muḥkam. Its examples are plentiful. If the report is opposed, then either the opposing is accepted just like it or it is rejected. As for the latter [case] there is no effect for it, since the strong is not affected by the opposition of the weak. If the opposing [report] is equal to it, then either it is possible to harmonise between the two meanings without deviation, or it is not. Thus if harmonisation is possible, then it is the type called mukhtalif al-ḥadīth.

Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ has given the example of the ḥadīth: ‘There is no contagion or evil fortune’ with the ḥadīth ‘Flee from a leper as you would from a lion.’ Both of them are sound and are apparently contradictory. The form of harmonisation is that illnesses do not infect by their nature. But Allāh has made the mixing with the ill a reason for a sound person to become ill, but then sometimes He does not, like with other causes. This is how Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ has harmonised between the two, in similar fashion to others. The best [opinion] in harmonisation between the two is to say that the negation from the Prophet ﷺ remains in its generality. For it has been authenticated from him ﷺ that he said: ‘Nothing infects another’ and that he refuted the one who remarked that an ill camel mixes with sound camels and thus becomes ill by saying: ‘Then who infected the first?’ In other words, Allāh initiated the illness in the second just as He did in the first. As for the order to flee from the leper, it is to stop the means [of wrongful thought]; that if a person mixes with the ill, then this [has occurred] with the will of Allāh originally, not from the negated contagion. Lest in which case he will think that mixing with the ill was the reason for his illness, and that he will [now] believe contagion does exist and thus he will occur in sin. So he is ordered to stay way to prevent such thought. And Allāh knows best.
Al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī has written a book in this type called Ikhtilāf al-ḥadīth, but he never intended to cover all aspects. After him, Ibn Qutayba, al-Ṭaḥāwī and others have also compiled literature.

In this new section, Ibn Ḥajar offers a different way of dividing the accepted (maqābūl), based on whether the ḥadīth is acted upon.

The particular section can only truly appreciated when one reflects upon the intellectual period Ibn Ḥajar was residing in. By the ninth Islamic century, the process of ḥadīth reporting with the full chains of transmissions had long ceased. Bayhaqī (d. 458/1066) declared that all the reports that could reliably be attributed to the Prophet had been documented by his time (Brown 2009, 42). The likes of al-Dhahabī (d. 748/1348) had resigned to the fact that no new, previously-undetected ḥadīth would be unearthed by his contemporaries. So by the ninth century, the emphasis moved to sifting the sound from the weak from the gathered material. Additionally, the scholars turned their attention to commenting on the material and understanding its application in sharī‘a.

This is where muḥkam and mukhtalif al-ḥadīth matters. In essence, this was the process of focussing on the matn and see what could be acted upon and what could not. Whereas the emphasis before in the Nuzhah was on the isnād, here the attention turns to the matn, to see whether the rich existing material on any given subject matter largely complied with one another or conflicted. Therefore this particular section in the Nuzhah is where the matn comes to the forefront in terms of importance.
In the _Nuzhah_, Ibn Ḥajar does admit that reports do exist that contradict one another (mukhtalif al-ḥadīth). But he also implicitly dismisses the extent of contradictory reports in ḥadīth literature. This is shown in many ways.

a. Firstly, he asserts that the bulk of ḥadīth literature is muḥkam. The thousands of reports gathered on the Prophet’s life during the early period of Islam seamlessly complement and support one another. This, Ibn Ḥajar is implying, is an indication of its authenticity.

b. Secondly, Ibn Ḥajar gives the same example of mukhtalif al-ḥadīth which Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ has offered in his _Muqaddima_ (ʿUlām al-ḥadīth), as indeed al-Sūyūṭī has cited in _Tadrīb_ (1972, 2:197). In fact, al-ʻIrāqī too cites the same example (1995, 335). The two contradictory reports in question are ‘There is no contagion or evil fortune and ‘flee from a leper as you would from a lion.’

It may simply be a coincidence that Ibn Ḥajar cited the same example as Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ and al-ʻIrāqī before him. Another possible interpretation is that by citing the same example, Ibn Ḥajar was trying to suggest that finding contradictory reports was so difficult and hard to come by, that the ‘ilm al-ḥadīth masters were pressed to find such examples and had resigned to using the same one everyone else had. This interpretation may not be so far-fetched when we observe that 95 Seemingly, the two reports contradict one another and both have been recorded in the celebrated works of al-Bukhārī and Muslim. But it is possible to arbitrate between the two in the sense that both can be acted upon, and that it is not necessary to disregard one in favour of the other. Ibn Ṣalāḥ states that in essence, there is no such thing as contagious diseases. This is supported by a similar ḥadīth of the Prophet where he said that nothing spreads from one host to another. Allāh does cause a person to sometimes catch a disease by mixing with a person who suffers from a particular ailment. But we also know that this is not always the case; a person can stay with a person with such a disease for a long period of time and be perfectly fine. This is how Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ had offered reconciliation between the two prophetic reports (1986, 284-5).

Ibn Ḥajar offers an answer from a slightly different angle, but agrees with Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ in that in essence, there is no basis to contagious diseases. The Prophet ﷺ once refuted a person who argued that a healthy camel usually becomes ill by mixing with ill camels, by asking ‘then who infected the first camel with the disease?’ It was Allāh, and He infected the second camel like He did with the first. The question remains as to why the Prophet ﷺ ordered to flee from the leper. The scholars write that this was a precautionary measure, so that a person does not think he was infected by the leper (and that he would never had been infected otherwise), but instead appreciates that everything occurs through the fate of Allāh. The Prophet himself was reported to have shared a meal with a leper (al-Wajīdī 1996, 93). only in the last section on i’tibār, shāhid and mutābi‘, Ibn Ḥajar chose a different example (the crescent moon sighting) from that of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ on the same subject matter (tanning) (1986, pp. 84-5). Now, using a different example served the purpose of showing the soundness of ḥadīth material; that supporting evidence in the form of shāhids and *mutābi‘*s could be found for countless examples and not just for one.

c. Thirdly, the nature of the example given in the Nuzhah suggests its unimportance. Knowing whether to flee from a leper or not is hardly a matter affecting the fundamental faith of a believer. This is typical according to Muslim scholars like al-Sibā‘ī. He indicates that the subject area of the contradictory reports all relate to relatively trivial matters in sharī‘a. None relate to the fundamental beliefs of Islam (1998, 229)

d. Fourthly, the previous section on mutābi‘, shāhid and i’tibār was given an extended analysis, which we suggested may be an indication of its importance to the author for that particular time. On the other hand, Ibn Ḥajar’s treatment of muḥkam and mukhtalif al-ḥadīth is brief and concise. This is a surprise to some extent; the Nuzhah tends to cover matters of significance and controversy with more detail ⁹⁶, this is perhaps one of the rarer occasions where the subject matter’s significance is not matched with the same emphasis by Ibn Ḥajar.

Why is mukhtalif al-ḥadīth important? It is important because it touches upon a theological problem that the Muslim scholars have had to deal with; is it possible for the Prophet to have contradicted himself in his dialogues?

The response from Muslim scholars on the issue – past and present – has been simple and straightforward. We are reminded that the words of Muḥammad are semi-divine and approved by God himself. The Qur’an affirms:

Your companion (Muḥammad) has neither gone astray nor has erred. Nor does he speak of (his own) desire. It is only an Inspiration that is inspired. (53; 2-4)

Therefore, Muslims should not for a moment entertain the idea that he contradicted himself.

Following on from this, the scholars explain that if the words of Muḥammad are seemingly contradictory, then this is because of our misunderstanding and misinterpretation, rather than the fallibility of Muḥammad. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ highlights this when he writes:

We heard that the authority Abū Bakr Muḥammad ibn Ishāq ibn Khuzayma said:
‘I am not aware that two [genuinely] antithetical (mutadāddayn) ḥadīth with sound chains were related from the Messenger of God (peace be upon him).
Whoever has seemingly contradictory ḥadīth, let him bring them to me for me to harmonise.’ (1986, 285)

We have seen this protectionism before, when discussing al-Tirmidhī’s unique terminology such as ḥasan sahīḥ (section 5.10). If it is confusing, it is because we do not understand it, not because of any deficiency in al-Tirmidhī. Here, if there are any contradictory reports, it is our shortcomings, not the Prophet’s.

This mindset of the Muslim scholars produces a very clear set of results. The Prophet could not have been wrong because he is flawless and perfect. The way the reports got to us cannot be wrong because they have sound chains supporting them. Therefore the scholars are left to take the seemingly contradictory material and employ a vast array of factors to prefer one narration over another. Al-Suyūṭī reminds us that there are over such fifty factors and in fact, according to others, over one hundred factors (1972, 2:198). 97 If the sayings and actions of the Prophet seem to oppose one another, we simply need to apply one (or more) of these factors to the texts and reach a suitable conclusion.

The Syrian scholar al-Sībā’ī follows a very similar approach to the Muslims before him. He does not view the contradictory material from the Prophet as an indication of forgery or contradiction. Rather, he suggests that these inconsistencies were sometimes deliberate and mostly understandable. Such an approach allows him to protect the Prophet and the scholars after him. In short, al-Sībā’ī shows that contradiction can occur:

a. Because the Prophet performed an act twice, in two different circumstances. One Companion reported one occurrence whereas the second Companion reported the other. An example of that is the dispute whether the minor ablution breaks when a person touches the genitals.

b. Because the Prophet performed an act twice differently to show its permissibility. An example of this is where the Prophet performed the evening witr prayer. Some 97 For example, the general rule is that a reporter known for excessive narration is favoured over someone who narrates less frequently, the shorter chain over the long chain, the reporter who is known for his expertise in judicial matters over the one who is not, the report which mentions words of delivery expressing certainty (like ‘I heard’) over the one using lesser words (such as ‘from’), the precedence of a Madinan report over a Makkan report, and so on.

Companions reported the number of units of this prayer to amount to three, whereas others reported seven, nine and eleven. The Prophet read all of these numbers to show its permissibility.

c. Because one report is acting as an abrogation of the other (which Ibn Ḥajar covers in section 5.16).

d. Because the Companions were reporting an act from the Prophet which they could not know the full extent of. For example, there is a difference of opinion regarding the exact type of hajj the Prophet performed before his demise; was it tamattu‘, mufrad or qirān. Al-Sibā‘ī believes that because this ritual related largely on one’s niyya (intention), no one could know for sure which type of hajj it was (al-Sibā‘ī 1998, pp. 229-231).

Muslims therefore entertain the possibility that perhaps the Prophet meant to show variation in his sayings and actions, which has subsequently been wrongly interpreted as contradiction. Al-Sakhawī reports that the Prophet said: ‘The ikhtilāf (difference of opinion) of my Companions is mercy for my umma’ (2003, 46). In other words, the conformity of his practice may have led to theological apathy after him. To avoid this, he deliberately showed ‘contradiction’ which would then allow Muslims after him to make the effort to study his sayings and actions. ‘Umar ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz too agreed that difference was not necessarily a bad thing when he said:

> It would not have pleased me to learn that the Companions of Muḥammad never differed. This is because if they did not differ, there would be no room for rukhsa (concession) for us (al-Sakhawī 2003, 46).
In short, the section here on mukhtalif al-hadīth symbolises how the Muslims deal with inconsistencies in the field. Disciples are taught to prefer one report over the other, using the countless factors available to them. Muslims are taught that the Prophet could not have been inconsistent, for this is a sign of weakness. In fact, it is better to believe that the inconsistencies were deliberate from the Prophet, for the sake of his believers. The Muslim approach on mukhtalif al-hadīth does not radically question the authenticity of the material, as the non-Muslim approach does. Muir is of the opinion that the existence of contradictory reports (allegedly) stemming from the Prophet was extensive proof of forgery and fabrication. His research on the numerous traditions of the Prophet on his Signet Ring points out that there are reports suggesting that the Prophet wanted a ring made from pure silver, whereas other reports suggest that Khālid ibn Sa‘īd had a ring made from iron, which he appropriated to his own use. A third report suggests that the ring was purchased for him from Abyssinia. There are also conflicting reports regarding what was inscribed on the ring. In fact, Muir writes, there are reports that suggest that he never had a ring (1858, I: LXXVI).

Goldziher and Schacht offer a simple answer as to why contradictory prophetic reports do exist; because the Prophet never uttered the words in the first place. Rather the opposing reports were fabrications, as a reaction to the political and doctrinal tensions that existed in the first two centuries. Goldziher writes:

> If [the ruling power] wished an opinion to be generally recognised and the opposition of pious circles silenced, it too had to know how to discover a hadīth to suit its purpose. They had to do what their opponents did: invent, or have invented, ḥadīths in their turn…it is not surprising that, among the hotly debated controversial issues of Islam, whether political or doctrinal, there is none in which the champions of the various views were unable to cite a number of traditions, all equipped with opposing isnāds (1971, pp. 43-4).

Schacht’s own observations are not radically different from Goldziher’s when he writes that every legal tradition is in reality a ‘fictitious expression of a legal doctrine formulated at a later date’ (1959, 149). Elsewhere, Schacht writes that ‘traditions are formulated polemically with a view to rebutting a contrary doctrine or practice’ (1958, 152). Competing geographical centres fought with one another through these fabrications. For example, the reports about Funeral prayers inside the mosque were directed at refuting the Medinese practice.

To conclude, mukhtalif al-ḥadīth seemingly suggests a large gulf between the western academics on the one hand and the Muslim scholars on the other. Muslims are faced with the crisis of defending the Prophet – the Śādiq – from discrepancies and inconsistencies, and their views on the subject reflect the seriousness of such a charge. For the western observers, mukhtalif al-ḥadīth is further proof that there remains real doubt over the authenticity of ḥadīth literature. Even if Muslims maintain that the contradictory reports to be found are over trivial matters in shari‘a, the western scholars suggest that they still call into question the whole edifice of ḥadīth as sources for Islamic law. Yet viewed from another angle, the difference between the two camps is smaller than depicted. Both agree on the existence of ikhtilāf, the disagreement lies in the extent of it and the reasons behind it.

If harmonisation is not possible, then there are possibilities; either the date is known [of the tradition] or not. If the date is known and one is proven as being later, or it is clarified [elsewhere], then this is nāsikh and the other is mansūkh. Nuskh is lifting the principle of a proof from shari‘a with a later proof from shari‘a. Nāsikh is that which indicates this mentioned lifting. Calling it nāsikh is metaphorical, because the abrogator in essence is Allāh Almighty.98

The abrogation is identified by [several] means; the clearest of them is the clarification in the text. [This is] like the ḥadīth of Burayda in Šāhīḥ Muslim [that the Prophet said]: ‘I had forbidden you to visit graves. Visit them; for indeed it reminds of the hereafter.’ Amongst [the means of identification] is that which the Companion states is the latter. [This is] like the saying of Jābir ☞ , ‘The last of the two orders from the Messenger of Allāh was the abandoning of ablution for what is touched by fire.’ The Companions of the Sunan99 have recorded this. Also amongst [the means of identification] is that which is known by the date; these are plentiful. Not included is that which is narrated by a Companion who accepted Islām late opposing that which is reported by someone who preceded him, because of the possibility that he heard it from a Companion [even] older than the one he is opposing, or like it and he made it mursal. However, if clarification occurs of him hearing it from the Prophet ☪ then it directs it towards it being the abrogating, with the condition that he did not narrate anything from the Prophet ☪ before his Islām.

98 The author here means that in reality, the force behind nuskh is Allāh; He abrogates a certain verse with another from the Qur’ān or inspires His Messenger to replace a ruling with another.
99 This means the works of al-Bukhārī, Muslim, Mālik and al-Tirmidhī (al-Wajīdī 1996, 96).

As for the Consensus (ijmā‘), thus this may not abrogate, but rather it indicates that.

Commentary

One of the most important types of prophetic reports to know and understand is analysed in this section, the abrogating (nāsīkh) and the abrogated (mansūkh). Naskh is the process of replacing one ruling from shari‘a and replacing with a latter one, provided that the latter is of a subsequent origin and the two rulings are enacted separately from one another (Kamali 2005, 127). Ibn Ḥajar’s analysis here is short yet very comprehensive. He explains well how it relates to the previous section on mukhtalif al-ḥadīth\(^\text{100}\), defines the terms involved and he offers different ways the scholars have differentiated the abrogating from the abrogated. A brief word on the role the ijmā‘ plays in abrogation concludes the section.

Like with mukhtalif al-ḥadīth, this discipline is reserved for the most skilled and experienced scholars. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ writes:

\(^{100}\text{In essence nāsīkh and mansūkh are a type of mukhtalif al-ḥadīth, because there are two reports which seemingly contradict one another and there is a means of arbitrating between them. The difference however is that with mukhtalif al-ḥadīth, both reports are still acted upon whereas with the abrogating and the abrogated, only one report – the latter one – is acted upon.}\)
This discipline is important and regarded as difficult. We heard that al-Zuhrī said, ‘It wears out legal scholars and makes it impossible to distinguish the abrogating ḥadīth from the abrogated’ (1986, pp. 276-7).

He warns further on:

Some of the scholars of ḥadīth who have occupied themselves with this discipline have included in it what does not properly belong, because of the obscurity of the meaning of abrogation and what it constitutes. (1986, 277)

If this is the case, then the Nuzhah here does not venture into the difficulties surrounding it and instead portrays the issue as relatively straightforward. Ibn Ḥajar argues that in identifying the abrogating and the abrogated, a researcher sometimes does not need to do anything, because a clear statement exists from the Prophet or the Companions identifying which ruling is nāsikh and which is mansūk. Ibn Ḥajar also suggests that the dates too can be of great help in differentiating the nāsikh and mansūkh and requires little effort. The only difficulty a researcher may come across is when the report stems from a Companion who accepted Islam late on.

101 The Nuzhah provides the example of Jābir to show how the statements of the Companions can help to identify the abrogating and the abrogated. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ offers another example of the abrogated by the statement of the Companion when he writes: ‘Examples of this are the ḥadīth which al-Tirmidhī and others have related in which Ubayy ibn Ka‘b said: ‘The major ablution was optional in the case of a seminal emission in the beginning of Islam and then the option was forbidden’” (1986, 277).

102 Ibn Ḥajar explains in the Nuzhah that if a ḥadīth narrated by a Companion who accepted Islam late contradicts a Companion who accepted Islam early on, then the former’s narration will not necessarily be accepted as abrogating. This is because there is a possibility that he heard the narration from a Companion who is even older than the one he’s opposing, or he may have narrated it as mursal al-ṣahābī (This is where the Companion ascribes a report to the Prophet, though he did not hear it himself; rather he heard it from another Companion, who heard it directly from the Prophet).
In reality, it is the role of the ijmāʿ (scholarly consensus) in abrogation that is most difficult to comprehend, yet Ibn Ḥajar gives it the least emphasis. He simply states that this cannot per se act as an abrogator, though it does indicate as to when a certain act is abrogated. There are two reasons offered by the scholars as to why the Consensus (ijmāʿ) cannot act as an abrogating element. Firstly, the Consensus is merely the consensus of the scholars, and this is not strong enough in sharīʿa to outweigh the sunna of the Prophet. Secondly, the Consensus only came into effect after the Prophet passed away, after which time, the abrogation had ceased.

Ibn Ḥajar has favoured an over-simplified outline of the abrogation, rather than an appreciation of its difficulty and indeed the controversy surrounding it. Burton has amply highlighted the controversy attached to nāsikh and mansūkh (ijmāʿ) (1994, 85-88, 113-115).

With references to the verses 2:234 and 2:240, he shows that the abrogation performed in the Qurʿān do not address a common issue (1994, 113). Then there is evidence to suggest that the rulings related to the penalty for illegal sexual relations imply that the Qurʿān can be abrogated by the sunna, something which many Muslim scholars feel uncomfortable with (1994, 114). Goldziher’s observations too question the role the ijmāʿ in relation to nāsikh and mansūkh. He argues that the ijmāʿ is ‘a counterweight to the attempt of traditionists to reform existing customs according to their own views and to oppose sharply the customary laws of society’ (1971, 88). Put simply, it was a political tool used by early Muslims to promote or demote certain principles.

As with many other sections covered so far, Ibn Ḥajar may have avoided detailed discussions on the abrogation because it does technically fall outside the sphere of ʿilm.

If he does clarify, however, that he heard it directly from the Prophet, then this can be accepted as nāsikh, as long as he did not narrate anything before he accepted Islam.

To summarise, Ibn Ḥajar clarifies that the abrogating report must be later in date than the abrogated.
al-hadīth. It is more related to fiqh. Alternatively, the section can be complimented for acting as a satisfactory introduction to nuskh, ideal for first-time students. The term is defined, examples are given and the means of spotting it is mentioned too. Nevertheless, the works of Burton do highlight the controversy surrounding nāsikh and mansūkh which are simply not addressed in the Nuzhah.

5. 16. 2. The Paused Upon.

If the date is not known, then there are possibilities. Either it is possible to prefer one report over the other by the many means of preference that pertain to the matn or isnād, or it is not possible. If harmonisation is possible, the preferred is specified. And if not, then it is not. Thus in reports in which there is apparent contradiction, it materialises in the following order; harmonisation if possible, then consideration for the abrogation and the abrogated, then preference if specified, then the paused upon from acting on one of the two reports. Describing it as ‘paused upon’ is better than describing it as ‘dropped’, because the impossibility of preferring one over the other is only in relation to the researcher at that [particular] moment. [There exists a] possibility that what is hidden becomes apparent [later] for someone else. And Allāh knows best.

In this last section, Ibn Ḥajar states that there will be circumstances where two contradictory reports cannot be harmonised by declaring one as an abrogating. If this is the case, then there are many means by which one report can be preferred over another. As mentioned earlier, such factors are numerous; al-Suyūṭī wrote that there are over such fifty factors and in fact, according to others, over one hundred factors (1972, 2:198). In the rare case where one report cannot be preferred over another, then this is shelved in a category called tawaqquf, or paused. Though this now means the report is not acted upon, it is not to say that the report is rejected. Rather, it is an acknowledgement that later scholars may be able to arbitrate between the reports which, for some reason, is unachievable by the earlier scholars. This itself is a moral statement from the ḥadīth scholars to say that they are fallible. The Companion Ibn Mas‘ūd once said that for a man to say: ‘I do not know’ in a matter he is ignorant of is in fact a sign of knowledge (al-‘Uthaymin 2002, 151).

5.16.2.1. Conclusion.

The last point in the preceding section needs further deliberation. The existence of tawaqquf implicitly suggests that no Muslim scholar claims to know all there is to know in ḥadīth literature. Al-Īmām Shāfi‘ī said:

We know of no one who possesses knowledge of all the sunnas without failing to have a portion of it. So if the knowledge of all the scholars is gathered, the entire sunna would be known. However, if the knowledge of each scholar is taken 103 For example: (i) Preferring the report declared as ṣaḥīḥ over hasan (ii) Preferring the marfū‘ over the mursal (iii) Preferring the riwāya bi-al-lafẓ over the riwāya bi-al-ma‘nā (transmission by words over transmission by meaning).

separately, each might be found lacking in some portion of it (in Azami 1996, 186).

This point is important because Schacht argues that:

The best way of proving that a tradition did not exist at a certain time is to show that it was not used as a legal argument in a discussion which would have made reference to it imperative, if it had existed (1959, 140).

His theory is based on the assumption that one scholar’s ignorance of a particular ḥadīth is sufficient proof that the ḥadīth did not exist, and the emergence of it later proves that it was later forged. But tawaqquf suggests otherwise. The simplest reason for the scenario Schacht describes is that the earlier scholars did not perhaps have knowledge of that ḥadīth. It is not necessary that all reports were apparent and available to all scholars at all times. Due to geographical differences, some could not have heard reports that others knew well.

Additionally, Azami points to what he sees as shortcomings in Schacht’s thesis. Firstly, he cites examples where the ḥadīth is to be found in earlier works but not later ones (1996, 119), such as the ḥadīth about ablution and touching the genital organs. This is the inverse of the pattern Schacht describes. Secondly, Schacht’s work is littered with references such as x ḥadīth was known to y and x ḥadīth was unknown to y\textsuperscript{104}. What does ‘unknown’ mean? Does it mean the scholar in question did not know it or did not record it? For instance, al-Bukhārī recorded only approximately four-thousand reports in his celebrated works, but knew in the region of seven-hundred thousand prophetic reports.

There is no clarification from Schacht as to what he meant by ‘unknown’ to x; either it means the scholar in question knew it but did not record it in writing, or he did know of it at all.

In general, Azami dismisses Schacht’s observations because they are based on:

…the e silentio principle, which assumes that if any one scholar at any given time was ignorant of a particular ḥadīth or failed to mention it or, rather, that if it is was not mentioned by later scholars that earlier scholars used that particular ḥadīth, then the ḥadīth did not exist at that time. If the ḥadīth is first found with incomplete isnād, and, later, with complete isnād, then the isnād has been ‘improved’, in other words, fabricated. In a Reductio ad absurdum, this argument would mean that if writer in the Middle East failed to mention London as one of the major cities in the world, then all the writers who mentioned it later would be guilty of collusion in creating a fictional city (1996, pp.115-6).

5.16.3. Summary of the accepted reports.
An opposing report exists

- Arbitration between the two reports is possible
  - Called ‘mukhtalif al-hadith’
    - Dates are not known and researcher cannot prefer one over another
      - Paused upon
    - Dates are known for both reports
      - nasikh & mansūkh

- Opposing report is weak
  - muhkam
  - No effect

No opposing reports exist
- No effect
5. 17. Mardūd- the Rejected and the reasons for rejection.

Then the rejected and the reasons that necessitate it is either because of a drop in the isnād or because of defamation in the narrator; according to the varying reasons for defamation that are more general than for a matter pertaining to the narrator’s piety and his accuracy. Thus the drop is either at the beginning of the isnād from the actions of the compiler or at the end, after the Successor, or other than that.

Commentary

In this prolonged and important section, Ibn Ḥajar focuses on rejected narrations (mardūd), and the reasons for their rejection. In principle the factors which necessitate the rejection of a ḥadīth are two;

a. A drop in the chain.

b. Defamation in the character of one of the narrators.

According to the number of drops and where the drop occurs, there are different types of rejected traditions. Likewise, there are different traditions according to the varying degrees of shortcomings in the narrator. Ibn Ḥajar commences with the mu‘allaq, a rejected ḥadīth due to a drop at the beginning of the chain.

Again, it seems that the isnād plays the pivotal role in the acceptance and the rejection of a prophetic report, not the matn. Both factors identified by Ibn Ḥajar have nothing or very little to do with the matn.

Thus the first is mu‘allaq, regardless of whether the drops are one or more. Between mu‘allaq and mu‘dīl, that will soon be explained, is ‘ummīm wa-khuṣṣūṣ min wajh.

Thus in terms of the definition of mu‘dīl – that two or more narrators are dropped – it resembles mu‘allaq in some cases. In terms of specifying mu‘allaq that it is [a result] of the actions of the compiler at the beginning of the chain, then it is different to mu‘dīl, as that is more general.

Amongst the forms of mu‘allaq is that the entire chain is omitted and it is said, for example, ‘the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ said x.’ Another form is that it is [all] omitted except the Companion, or the Successor and the Companion. Another form is that the person the report is reported from is omitted and it is ascribed to the one above. If the one above is the shaykh for the compiler, then there is a dispute; is it called mu‘allaq or not? The correct opinion in this matter is that detail [is required]. If it is known through textual evidence or investigation that the one doing this is a mudallis, then it is declared as such. Otherwise, it is [declared as] mu‘allaq.

Mu‘allaq has been mentioned in the section of the rejected because of the ignorance surrounding the omitted narrator. However, sometimes it is declared as sound if the [same] report is mentioned elsewhere with the narrator named. If someone says ‘everyone that I have omitted are authoritative (thiqa)’ then the issue of ‘authentication by ambiguity’ arises. According to the majority, it will not be accepted until he names them. However, Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ said here: ‘If the omission occurs in a book devoted to authentic traditions only, like Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī and Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim, then if the words of narrations are words of conviction and certainty, then it will be accepted and [it will be assumed] that he omitted the chain for a [genuine] reason from the various reasons. And if the words of narration are not words of conviction, then there is a dispute. I have explained such examples in al-Nukat ‘alā Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ.

105 Ibn Ḥajar cites a scenario where one ḥadīth can be categorised under two different terminologies; mu‘allaq and mu‘dīl. The former is where there are one or more consecutive drops at the beginning of the chain, and the latter is where there are two or more consecutive drops, irrespective of where exactly in the chain. Thus, when there are two consecutive drops at the beginning of the chain, the ḥadīth can be labelled mu‘allaq and mu‘dīl. If there is only one drop at the beginning, then it will be classified as mu‘allaq, and if there are two consecutive drops in the duration of the chain (and not at the beginning), then it will be categorised as mu‘dīl.

Commentary

The first type of the rejected which Ibn Ḥajar explains in this new section is mu‘allaq, a ḥadīth where one or more narrators are missing at the top part of the chain, namely the side of the compiler. After outlining how this compares with mu‘dīl, he shows some of the forms it can assume,106 followed by a discussion on its principle. A clear indication is given from the author that the Nuzhah is not intended as the final word on the discipline, but rather an introductory text. Like we shall see elsewhere in this section, Ibn Ḥajar sometimes asks the reader to extend his/her sights on his other more detailed works on a

106 Ibn Ḥajar outlines the different forms mu‘allaq can assume;
i. Sometimes the whole isnād from the beginning is omitted, and the compiler first mentions the words ‘The Prophet said x’.
i. Sometimes the whole isnād is omitted except the Companion (ṣaḥābī).
iii. Sometimes the whole isnād is omitted except the Companion (ṣaḥābī) and the Successor (tābī‘ī).
iv. Sometimes only the narrator’s shaykh is missing and it is ascribed to the person after him. This practice is frowned upon because some narrators have omitted the shaykh for fraudulent purposes, which in ‘ilm al-ḥadīth terminology is called taddīs (A full explanation for taddīs is offered later by the author, covered here in section 5.21.). Thus Ibn Ḥajar writes that if it is known that the narrator commits taddīs through evidence and investigation, then the ḥadīth will be classified as such. Otherwise, it will be considered as mu‘allaq.
v. There have been cases where the reporter has refused to explicitly name the chain and instead merely says that all of his omitted men are authoritative. This, as Ibn Ḥajar writes, is called ta‘dīl ‘alā al-ibhām (authentication by ambiguity). Such a statement from the narrator is not sufficient to warrant the authenticity of the ḥadīth. Rather the majority of scholars adhere to the opinion that his men must be named before the report can be accepted. This is because the men may be considered authoritative according to him, but not to other scholars (al-Munāwī 1999, 1: 491).
particular area, or that of the esteemed scholars. Here, he writes that a more detailed discussion on the ruling of mu‘allaq can be found in al-Nukat ‘alā Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ.

All scholars unanimously agree that in principle, mu‘allaq is rejected. The reason is simple: the absence of one narrator or more means the chain is now discontinuous. And as outlined earlier, one of fundamental prerequisites for a sound report (ṣahîḥ) is that the isnâd is continuous.

However, like scholars before him, Ibn Ḥajar offers to make an exception to this general rule. If mu‘allaq appears in a compilation reserved for authentic traditions only, like Ṣahîḥ al-Bukhârî and Ṣahîḥ Muslim, then it will be accepted if reported with words suggesting certainty. This means that the compiler uses words such as qa‘la (he said) rather than qîla (it was said).

In effect, Ibn Ḥajar is bailing out al-Bukhârî, whose Ṣahîḥ is full of mu‘allaq reports.107 By including this exception, one can still readily accept the authenticity of his Ṣahîḥ, despite the existence of mu‘allaq reports in it. In addition to this bail-out, the Muslim scholars have gone on to justify the frequent inclusion of mu‘allaq reports in his Ṣahîḥ.

For instance:

a. One reason offered is that he often names a chapter or sub-chapter using the words of a ḥadîth. Because it was merely acting as a heading, he did not see the need to mention the full isnâd. An example of this is ‘Chapter: the ears are from the head.’

107 From the different forms of mu‘allaq mentioned in the Nuzhah, many are to be found in the works of al-Bukhârî. As an example where al-Bukhârî omitted the entire chain, he includes a ḥadîth where he simply states: ‘The Prophet said: ‘The most beloved religion to Allâh is the moderate, tolerant one’ (Book of Faith; Chapter; ‘the religion is easy’). In other instances he has omitted the entire chain except the Companion. For example, he writes: ‘Abû Mûsâ al-Ash’ârî said: ‘The Prophet covered his thighs when ‘Uthmân entered.’ (Book of Prayer; Chapter; what has been mentioned regarding the thighs.)
b. Another answer is that he mentioned the same report repetitively in his Sahih. There are 7275 prophetic reports in the work of al-Bukhārī, but excluding the repetitions, this number falls to four thousand. So because he mentions one ḥadīth in his works with the full chain named, he did not see the need to mention the same ḥadīth with the full chain again elsewhere. Rather he shortened it and simply wrote ‘the Prophet said’, without mentioning the full isnād again (al-Munāwī 1999, 1: 488).

But it seems that the Muslim scholars after al-Bukhārī have fallen somewhat short of offering a credible and fool-proof reason for the large scale inclusion of mu‘allaq reports in the works of al-Bukhārī. According to al-Suyūṭī, there are one hundred and sixty reports in Sahih al-Bukhārī that are mu‘allaq and have not been mentioned elsewhere with the full isnād in his works (1972, 1: 117). It was the later scholars who analysed these reports and mentioned the full chain for them, like al-Nawawī in his treatise Tawfiq (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 117).

More importantly, no scholar has entertained the idea that perhaps the mu‘allaq reports in his work should simply be rejected, owing to the drop in the isnād. Because of the prestige and esteem attached to his work, it seems that the scholars, including Ibn Ḥajar, dare not declare the mu‘allaq reports in his works as inadequate and short of the standard of sahih. In short, the scholars are saying that mu‘allaq should certainly be rejected, but only if it is not in the prized works of al-Bukhārī and Muslim.

Leading on from this, we can see that the Nuzhah is descriptive of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth and not prescriptive. Ideally, Ibn Ḥajar wanted to declare mu‘allaq rejected but he had to incorporate a ruling for it which justified al-Bukhārī’s large-scale inclusion of such reports. To some extent therefore, the Nuzhah laid down the laws of what had occurred and not what should occur.

In conclusion, we can note the protectionism given by later scholars (like Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ, al-Nawawī and Ibn Ḥajar) to the ḥadith masters such as al-Bukhārī. We have already seen this in section 5.7 too. This section on muʿallaq shows that the later scholars started with the assumption that al-Bukhārī was correct, and that if there are discrepancies, it is because of our shortcomings. By the time of Ibn Ḥajar, it was the duty to defend the works of their predecessors’ endeavours, not question their methodology and results. So this section on muʿallaq works on many levels. In its simplest form, it is an informative account of what muʿallaq is, what forms it can take on and what the ruling for it is, all of which is suitable for a disciple wishing to learn about ʿilm al-hadīth for the first time. On another level, it is an attempt by Ibn Ḥajar to defend his field, his climate and indeed his personal circumstances; as noted in section 5.9.4, the ninth Islamic century was a time when writing a commentary on Ṣahīḥ al-Bukhārī was in vogue (Brown 2009, 53). Ibn Ḥajar’s magnum opus was the commentary of Ṣahīḥ al-Bukhārī called Fath al-bārī. It would be seen as contradictory on his part to present a prized and coveted work relating to the great al-Imām al-Bukhārī, and then seriously question his material.

5.19. Mursal- the Loose

The second – and this is where there is a drop after the successor (tābiʿī) – is mursal. And from its forms is that the tābiʿī will say – regardless of whether he is a senior or junior tābiʿī – that ‘the Prophet said ’, or ‘did ’ or ‘x was done in his presence’ or its likes.
Mursal is mentioned in the types of rejected traditions because of ignorance surrounding the missing reporter. This is because it is possible the missing person is a șahābī or a tābiʿī. In the latter case, then he could be weak or authentic. In the case of him being authentic, he could have narrated it himself from a șahābī or from a fellow tābiʿī. And in the latter case, the previous possibility returns and multiplies. As for in theory, this pattern could continue endlessly. In practice, this has occurred up to six or seven times; this is the most found where Successors have narrated from one another.

If it is known from the habit of a tābiʿī to drop only from an authoritative narrator, then the majority of ḥadīth scholars are of the opinion of tawaqquf (pausing) because of the [aforementioned] existing possibility. This is one of the opinions of al-Imām Aḥmad. His second opinion – which is also the opinion of the Mālikīs and Kūfīs – is that it will be accepted unequivocally. Al-Imām al-Shāfiʿī said that if support is found in another ḥadīth – whether this second supporting narration is continuous or mursal – then this favours accepting the ḥadīth and assuming the missing person is authoritative. It has been reported from Abū Bakr al-Rāzī (from the Ḥanafīs) and Abū al-Walīd al-Bājī (from the Mālikīs) that when the narrator performs īrsāl from authoritative narrators and other than them, their mursal report will unanimously not be accepted.

Commentary

Of the rejected traditions based on a drop in the chain, mursal is perhaps the type which has led to most disagreements, something which Ibn Ḥajar touches upon:
a. Disagreement in the definition.

i. Ibn Ḥajar simply describes mursal as where the drop occurs after the Successor, namely the tābi‘ī. He does not elaborate on the age of this Successor and therefore, according to him, this can be a senior or junior tābi‘ī.\(^{108}\)

ii. According to the scholars of fiqh and usūl al-fiqh, mursal is defined in a more general way. Any type of disconnection is called mursal according to them, regardless of where and what type of disconnection it is. This is also the opinion of al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī (in Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 52).

iii. Bayqūnī also offers another variation on the definition. He writes that mursal is where the ‘Companion is dropped in the chain’ (in al-‘Uthaymin 2002, 161). Technically, this is not always the case, as Ibn Ḥajar clearly indicates in the Nuzhah.\(^{109}\)

iv. Ibn ‘Abd al-Barr believes that the Successor’s age is of paramount importance in the definition of mursal. He writes that when the likes of al-Zuhri, Abū Ḥāzim and Yahyā ibn Sa‘īd al-Anṣārī – all junior Successors – say ‘The Prophet ☪ said…’ then their ḥadīth is not called mursal but munqati‘. This is because they only met a handful of Companions and most of their reports originate from fellow Successors. Only the reports of the senior Successors are classified as mursal (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 52-3). Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ too implicitly suggests that the age of the Successor must be taken into consideration with a mursal report when he writes:

\(^{108}\) A senior tābi‘ī is defined as one who spent a considerable amount of time with the Companions, such as Qays ibn Abī Ḥāzim and Sa‘īd ibn al-Musayyab. A junior tābi‘ī refers to someone who spent only a short period of time in the Companions, like Yahyā ibn Sa‘īd al-Anṣārī.

\(^{109}\) The Successor’s missing narrator is usually a Companion because this is the next logical generation after theirs. But as Ibn Ḥajar points out, the person who he missed could be a tābi‘ī or it could be a ṣahābi. Therefore, Bayqūnī’s definition does not case for the unconventional cases where a Successor takes from a fellow Successor, rather than from a Companion.
The form of the mursal ḥadīth about which there is no disagreement is the ḥadīth of a senior (my italics) Successor – like ‘Ubayd Allāh ibn ‘Adi ibn al-Khayyār, Sa‘īd ibn al-Mussayab and those like them who met a number of the Companions and attended their classes – when he says, ‘the Messenger of God said (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 52).

b. Disagreement regarding its ruling.

i. Mursal is deemed as weak and rejected according to the majority of the ḥadīth scholars (Mīghālwi 2003, 393). In the introduction to his Ṣahīḥ, al-Imām Muslim states that ‘a mursal tradition does not constitute a hujja on the basis of the principles of our doctrine and of the doctrine of the tradition experts’ (Juynboll (ed.) 1996, III: 296, Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 55). They maintain that the missing narrator could be other than a Companion, and thus could be weak (Ṭahṭān 2001, 54-55).

ii. The Nuzhah states that mursal is considered as a rejected ḥadīth because the isnād is not continuous. One would assume that if the Successor reports a ḥadīth and ascribes it directly to the Prophet, then the missing person would only be a Companion. But Ibn Ḥajar warns that this is not the case. It could be that he heard from a fellow Successor who then heard from a Companion in which case there are two reporters missing.110

110 There have been examples in the past where the number of reporters between the Successor who is doing the irsāl and the Prophet is six or seven. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī cites a tradition from a reporter belonging to the Successors in which there were six more reporters before it reached the wife of Abū Ayyūb. He commented that: ‘If the wife of Abū Ayyūb was a Companion, then there are six people missing. If she is not, then there are seven missing’ (cited in al-Munāwī 1999, 1: 500-1).
However, Ibn Ḥajar deems it important to mention the cases where the Successor omits the person he narrated from, but he is known only to report from authoritative reporters. As clarified in the text, the majority of ḥadīth scholars state that we will pause upon it, since the possibility still remains that he did not narrate from an authoritative person in this case. However, some scholars – like the Mālikīs and Kūfīs – state that it will be accepted without question.

Seemingly, this position contradicts with the ruling made in the section on muʿallaq. There, Ibn Ḥajar clearly affirms that when a narrator does not name his sources and instead merely says that all of his omitted men are authoritative, then this is not accepted. Rather the majority of scholars adhere to the opinion that his men must be named before the report can be accepted. Thus on this basis, the report of a Successor who omits a narrator should also be rejected until the source is named. Why is it that some scholars will accept this unequivocally, like al-Imām Aḥmad in one of his two opinions on the issue and like the Mālikī and Kūfī ḥadīth scholars? Ibn Ḥajar offers no answer to this change in opinion.

The answer to this question lies in the fact that with mursal, if the missing reporter is only one Companion, then his ambiguity does not affect the authenticity of the ḥadīth. This is because all Companions are deemed credible and reliable in ʿilm al-ḥadīth. As a result, therefore, the scholars of ḥadīth are willing to offer more leniency in the principle of mursal.
The idea of the ‘adāla (integrity) of the Companions is not new. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī elucidates on it in al-Kifāya. He states that it is necessary to ask about the character of all narrators in an isnād, except the Companions. This is – as al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī maintains – because their ‘adāla is ‘proven and known by the confirmation of Allāh Almighty, by informing us of their purity and worthiness in the Qur’an’ (1988, 46). Thus, questioning their rank is on a par with questioning the opinion of Allāh and His Prophet on the matter.

Therefore, the ruling for mursal and mu’allaq differs on this basis. With the mu’allaq the missing reporters do not belong to the generation of Companions and thus they must be explicitly identified and investigated. As for mursal, because there is a possibility that only a Companion is missing, the scholars are willing to loosen the ruling governing it.111

ii. According to the three imāms of fiqh – Abū Ḥanīfa, Mālik and Aḥmad112 (in a famous report from him) – mursal is accepted and used as evidence so long as the person doing the īrsāl is authoritative and only reports from authentic narrators. Their justification is that an authoritative Successor would not consider it permissible to say ‘the Prophet said x’ except when they heard it from someone authoritative (Ṭaḥhān 2001, 54-55: Mīghālwī 2003, 393).

111 More will be mentioned on the integrity of the Companions in section 5.41.
112 According to al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī it is accepted but under certain conditions. The conditions are four; three concerning the narrator (mursil) and one concerning the actual ḥadīth. They are (a) that the narrator is from the Senior Successors (b) when he does name his source, he names someone authoritative (c) when he narrates alongside the renowned huffāż, he does not oppose them. The fourth condition must be from one of the following (i) The ḥadīth is narrated via another isnād which is continuous. (ii) That ḥadīth is narrated via another isnād which is mursal, but the narrators are different from the original mursal ḥadīth. (iii) The ḥadīth complies with the saying of a Companion. (iv) That the scholars decree in compliance with the meaning of the ḥadīth.’ (Ṭaḥhān 2001, 54-55). It is also reported that al-Shāfi‘ī was of the opinion that only the mursal reports of Sa‘īd ibn al-Musayyab are worthy of acceptance. Al-Suyūṭī believes that this is not true and people have misunderstood his text in al-Umm (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 199).
So in short, the fiqh scholars are more lenient in accepting mursal whereas the ḥadīth scholars are stricter. The reason for this is simple; a large degree of prophetic reports which relate to fiqh (such as worships and dealings) are mursal. If the fiqh specialists such as Abū Ḥanīfa chose to reject mursal like the ḥadīth scholars did, then this would seriously diminish the number of prophetic reports they could use for evidence. Burton writes that:

Attitudes to the mursal ḥadīth varied, although the greatest scholars, especially those engaged in codifying the Law, view it with indulgence, this type of ḥadīth being the source of a great quantity of badly-needed material (1994, 112).

Goldziher agrees when commenting on the Muwatṭa’ of Mālik:

A proper isnād chain is not considered an absolute necessity, and nearly a third of the sayings employed by Mālik are mursal or even maqtū’, i.e. they do not go as far back as the Prophet but end the chain with the name of a Companion… (1971, 202).

For example, the jurists have struggled to find marfu’ (namely, a report proven as the actions or sayings of the Prophet himself) reports that legitimise the recitation of the Qur’ān in congregational prayer behind the imām. Abū Ḥanīfa argues that the person behind the imām is not required to perform recitation, based on the report ‘whosoever has an imām, then the imām’s recitation is considered his recitation too’ (Sa‘īdī 2009, 196). This report is mursal but Abū Ḥanīfa happily accepts it as evidence.

So mursal shows how the scholars in the past disagreed according to their respective specialty, fiqh and ḥadīth in this example. It also suggests like, with mu‘allaq, that the ruling applied to a particular type of ḥadīth (mursal in this instance) was based on convenience and necessity, rather than objectivity. Ideally, mursal should be rejected because of the absence of a reporter in the isnād, but applying this ruling would leave the fiqh scholars with less resources to work with. We noted a similar theme in the discussion on ‘azīz in the Nuzhah. In order to protect and widen the hadīth literature available, rulings were made to increase the amount of material, not to lessen it. That is why the Nuzhah discarded the argument that a sahīh hadīth has to be at least ‘azīz for it to be accepted. Here, in a similar fashion, rulings are made that ensure the hadīth literature pool is as wide as possible and so mursal is accepted.

Secondly, one could argue that Ibn Ḥajar’s approach was centred towards ḥadīth rather than fiqh. Any discussions that technically felt outside this sphere, he perhaps felt, were not his jurisdiction.

5.19.1. Conclusion.

Though less than a third of the Nuzhah has been looked at so far, we can already appreciate the author’s insistence on focusing on ‘ilm al-ḥadīth only, to the exclusion of fiqh. Sometimes, the refusal to extend his analysis to such areas has hindered a true portrayal of the ḥadīth type in question, like with mursal.

It is hard to dismiss this as a mere coincidence; that matters relating to ʿilm al-fiqh are largely ignored or only touched upon. What is the reason behind this? Why did Ibn Ḥajar focus on ḥadīth matters only? The real answer may be difficult to find, but what follows is a few plausible suggestions:

1. From the onset, the Nuzhah was meant to be a simple treatise, with no excess and no needless deviation from ʿilm al-ḥadīth. As mentioned in his introduction, his contemporaries asked for a brief book on ḥadīth not shariʿa. Had he indulged in debates such as the acceptance of khabar al-ʿahd, it would have prolonged what was meant to be an introductory short treatise to the field.

2. As a skilled author, Ibn Ḥajar did not want overlap with his literary works. He had authored twenty-eight books on fiqh-related matters (al-Qārī 1994, pp. 48-49). It made sense to him to discuss fiqh matters in such books, rather than ḥadīth ones.

3. Ibn Ḥajar may have possessed a possible distaste for fiqh. Or to word it differently, his own personal circumstances affected his literary works. He served as the chief justice of Egypt for some time. He undertook this responsibility in the judiciary in 827/1423 and fulfilled this until 852/1449 (Aḥmadayn 1958, 10; al-Barrī et al. 1995, 102).

Ibn Ḥajar himself admitted that he reluctantly undertook this responsibility. The reason was that countless students and disciples eager to learn from him would travel from afar to meet and learn from him. But because of his preoccupation with judicial duties, many could not meet him (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 102). Other commentators write that lack of autonomy was the reason for his reluctance (al-Qārī 1992, 53). Mulla ʿAlī al-Qārī suggests that he did not enjoy this responsibility:

Ibn Ḥajar maintained that he would not enter into the judiciary. He turned down the post of deputising Ṣadr al-Dīn al-Munāwī before 800. He was then offered the post independently in the days of Muʿayyad, which he refused. His colleagues pressed him to take up the position and so he eventually accepted it. He was appointed the justice for the Shāfiʿī madhhab in the reign of al-Ashraf Barsbāy in 827/1423. He showed increasing regret for taking up the position because the representatives of the state did not differentiate between the scholars and others, and because they refused to accept the scholars’ proposals, though the proposals were compliant with haqq (truth). His absence from the office became more and more apparent, until he tendered his resignation in 852/1449 after twenty-one years of service. Because of his persistence on the truth and his refusal to pay lip-service [to the state], the post became too difficult for him (al-Qārī 1992, 53).

Ibn Ḥajar was not acting indifferently by showing reluctance to fully engage with this post. Makdisi notes that ‘many jurisconsults of high repute are known to have refused to accept an appointment in spite of the insistence of the caliph.’ Others, Makdisi notes, only accepted it with ‘certain conditions’ (1981, 200). Broadbridge notes that it was not only Ibn Ḥajar who found it difficult to hold positions of importance during that period: the likes of al-ʿAynī and al-Maqrīzī had similar problems (1999, pp. 88-90).

More will be said about this is section 5.36.
Implicitly, this suggests that Ibn Ḥajar may have been affected by the political climate of his era, in his teaching and in his literary works too.

To summarise this section on mursal, there are countless different rulings of mursal\textsuperscript{114} and it is here where one can appreciate how different scholars in their respective specialist areas offer different opinions. Ibn Ḥajar’s analysis is narrowly-focussed on mursal from a ḥadīth perspective, not a fiqh one.

5. 20. Muʿdīl & munqaṭī’- the Problematic and the Interrupted.

The third type pertaining to the drop in the chain; if it is two drops or more consecutively, then it is muʿdīl. And if it is not [consecutive], namely that the drops are two inconsecutively in two [separate] places, for example, then it is munqaṭī‘. Similarly, if there is one single drop only, or there is more but with the condition of being inconsecutive [then this is also muʿdīl].

The third and fourth type of ḥadīth based on the drop in the isnād are mentioned here, muʿdīl and munqaṭī’. Little commentary or explanation is offered regarding its forms and principle, though sufficient is mentioned to outline its appearance. What is clear is that \textit{mu’\text{"dil}} is worse than the other types in this category because there are at least two, consecutive missing reporters.

As for \textit{munqa\text{"t}i’}, modern \textit{\text{"h}adith} scholars state that this is the name given to a general drop in the chain when it does not take on the appearance of other types of \textit{\text{"h}adith}. In other words, for a \textit{\text{"h}adith} to be classified as \textit{munqa\text{"t}i’}, the drop must not be;

(i) At the beginning of the chain, as this is categorised as \textit{mu’allaq}.

(ii) After the Successor, as this is called \textit{mursal}.

(iii) Two consecutive ones, as this is referred to as \textit{mu’\text{"dil}}.

Only when the \textit{\text{"h}adith} avoids the above three scenarios is it classified as \textit{munqa\text{"t}i’} (\text{"T}a\text{"h}h\text{"a}n 2001, 57).

The other opinion regarding \textit{munqa\text{"t}i’} is the one held by earlier scholars; that any type of drop is called \textit{munqa\text{"t}i’}. Al-Suy\text{"u}\text{"f}i writes:

The correct opinion towards which the jurists, al-Kha\text{"t}ib [al-Baghd\text{"a}d\text{"i}], Ibn ‘Abd al-Barr and others from the \textit{\text{"h}adith} masters have inclined to is that \textit{munqa\text{"t}i’} is that whose chain is not continuous in any form. And most commonly it is used for the report of those beneath the Successors from the Companions (1972, 1: 208).
\end{quote}

Therefore it seems the exact definition of \textit{munqa\text{"t}i’} differs according to earlier and later scholars. In a literal sense, both interpretations are feasible as the word means to ‘be cut-off’. However, the word should not be confused with \textit{maqt\text{"u}}\textsuperscript{115}, which is a term that relates to the matn rather than the isnād. It seems that Schacht fails to acknowledge this difference, and sees the two as synonymous. He writes:

…Shaibānī and al-Shāfī‘ī confront each other objections to their respective traditions because they are maqṭū‘, which means the same as munqāṭi‘ (1959, 38).

This section shows how the technical terms in the discipline developed throughout the centuries. During the early period, one term (such as munqāṭi‘) would be sufficient to encompass a multiple of scenarios. By the time of Ibn Ḥajar, the technical terms had flourished to cover all possible outcomes and scenarios.

The introduction of new terms such as mu‘ḍil did not increase the authenticity of prophetic traditions. What it did do was portray the discipline as a very intricate and multi-layered one, with a plethora of terms to cover each and every possibility. This itself did add to the authenticity debate in some form. The reason is because it portrayed the discipline as a rigid, objective and professional field, able to cope with the task of sifting the sound from the forged. The method in which Ibn Ḥajar has so far presented the rejected traditions in the Nuzhah suggests that he too was keen to the discipline in such a manner.

5. 21. Mudallas- the Misrepresented.

Then the drop in the chain is sometimes visible so all [observers] can identify it, because the narrator – for example – is not a contemporary of the one he narrated from; or sometimes the drop is hidden. Thus this cannot be identified except by the expert imāms who are aware of the [different] paths of the ḥadīth. Thus the first – the visible one – is identified by the non-meeting between the narrator and the shaykh as he did not live in his time, or he did live in his time but he did not meet him and he did not have permission from him or discovery.⁹¹⁶ For this, historical records are required as they consist of the birthdates of the narrators, their death-dates, the dates of their studies and their travels. Verily groups [of reporters] have achieved notoriety by claiming to have narrated from their shaykhs, only for historical records to refute their claims.

The second type – the hidden one – is mudallas (with a fatḥa on the lām). [This is] so called because the narrator has not named the one he heard from and has created doubt in hearing the ḥadīth from someone he did not narrate from. Its origins is from ‘dalas’ with a ḥaraka [on the lām]; and this means ‘the mixing of darkness’.¹¹⁷ This [type of ḥadīth] is so called because both involve concealment. The one committing tadhīl mentions it with the words of delivery that give the possibility of the occurrence of the meeting between him and the one he ascribes it to, like ‘an and like qāla. When it occurs with the words of certainty, he will be [classified as] a liar.

The ruling for the reliable narrator for whom it is proven that he has committed

⁹¹⁶ Ibn Ḥajar acknowledges that there can be certain cases where the report of the narrator from the shaykh can be proven as sound even if they lived in two different times and places. This can be the case when the shaykh delivers his traditions in written form to the narrator and grants him permission to report them further. This is called ijāza. Secondly, it can be where the narrator finds a script of traditions in which the compiler has granted permission to narrate to all. This is called wijāda (see section 5.57). Neither of these cases relates to mudallas, as suggested in the text when Ibn Ḥajar writes, ‘he did live in his time but he did not meet him and he did not have permission from him or discovery.’

tadlīs is that he will not be accepted until he clarifies he heard the report, according to the most correct opinion.

In this section, Ibn Ḥajar refers to mudallas. This term refers to when on previous occasions, the reporter has heard reports from his shaykh. In the particular report in which he is committing tadlīs, he has not heard from him and he reports it with such words of delivery that give the impression he did hear from him.\(^{118}\)

To understand how delicately the author has treated this section on mudallas, it is important to outline how the matter has divided the experts. Only then can we appreciate the skill employed by Ibn Ḥajar as an author here.

In short, mudallas is finely balanced. For some, it is a serious problem which highlights the tricks used by the forgers to escape detection whereas for others, it is an exaggerated problem. Ibn Ḥajar’s analysis of mudallas in the Nuzhah captures these two moods well, thus indicating his good skills as a writer.

5. 21. 1. The seriousness of mudallas.

Rather than simply acknowledging its rejection, the Muslim scholars have gone to considerable descriptive detail to highlight how vile tadlīs is. For example, Shu‘ba said:

\(^{118}\) This can be such as ‘x said’ (qāla) or ‘from x’ (‘an), as opposed to words such as ‘I heard’ (sami‘tu) or ‘x informed me’ (akhbaran). Using the latter words of delivery would necessitate him being a liar, something the person committing tadlīs wants to avoid (al-‘Uthaymin 2002, 168).
Committing adultery would be more beloved to me than performing tadlîs (al-Munāwī 1999, 2: 16).

Al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī said:

Tadlîs is the brother of the lie (in Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 74).

Brown sees tadlîs as large-scale îsnād forgery (1999, 98) and similar expressions and statements are offered almost universally condemning this practice.

Ibn Ḥajar only refers to one type of tadlîs that is tadlîs al-îsnād.119 Scholars such as al-Suyūṭī and Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ have identified a second variation called tadlîs al-shuyūkh (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 223; Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 74). This is where a narrator narrates a ḥadîth from a shaykh whom he has heard from. He then refers to him with a name, title or description that others are unfamiliar with, so that his status remains ambiguous. For example, Abū Bakr ibn Mujāhid once said: ‘Abd Allâh ibn Abī ‘Abd Allâh told us…’ He meant Abū Bakr ibn Abī Dâwūd al-Sijistānî (Ṭaḥḥān 2001, 61). One reason why a reporter may commit such an act is to hide the embarrassment that he is reporting from someone younger than him, or from his own son. There are other instances where the reporter has changed the name because the one he is reporting from is considered weak (al-Munāwī 1999, 17-18). Al-Suyūṭī adds that the reporter may have narrated from one particular shaykh excessively and thus he alters the name to give the impression that he has a variety of sources (1972, 1: 231). These factors certainly give us an insight into the 119 Perhaps the reason why Ibn Ḥajar does not mention tadlîs al-shuyūkh in this section is because he mentioned it further on in the book, under the name of jahâla. See section 5.35.

subjective side of ḥadīth transmission. Rather than an objective academic exercise where a report is heard and passed on to others, the practice of tadlīs shows that sometimes, reporters had to consider the personal and social impact of whom they narrate from would have.

5. 21. 2. The over-precaution surrounding mudallas.

Closer analysis and insight can reveal that the issue of tadlīs is not as serious as depicted by the Muslim scholars. Firstly, the issue of tadlīs was never a universal problem. According to al-Ḥākim, the issue of committing tadlīs was particular to certain areas. He said:

The people of Ḥijāz, the two Sanctuaries, Egypt, ‘Awālī, Khurāsān, al-Jibāl, Iṣbahān, the countries of Fārs and Khūzistān; we do not know any of their imāms to commit tadlīs. Most of tadlīs stems from the inhabitants of Kūfa and a small percentage from the inhabitants of Baṣra. As for the inhabitants of Baghdād, tadlīs has not been reported from any of them bar Abū Bakr Muḥammad ibn Muḥammad al-Bāghhandī al-Wāṣīṭī: he was the first to commit tadlīs there. If anyone thereafter did commit tadlīs then it was because of his precedent (in al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 232).

Secondly, the mudallis (one committing tadlīs) is not technically a liar. He is declaring that a senior said x (qāla) which is true. All that is disputed is whether he heard him say this directly or indirectly. Azami writes:
This is similar to the modern situation when we say that the king or the President said so and so, though we have not had the opportunity to hear him directly, except through press or TV etc. But this expression may be used in direct hearing as well (1977, 63).

Brown notes:

Tadlīs did not always occur for insidious reasons. If a student had to leave a dictation session to answer nature’s call, for example, he would hear the ḥadīths that he had missed from a class-mate. When narrating those ḥadīths, however, he might leave out the classmate’s name and simply say ‘Teacher so-and-so said.’ Because tadlīs was often innocuous, very few transmitters were totally innocent of it (2009, 91).

This last point from Brown can be shown from the example given by Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ in his Muqaddima:

‘Alī ibn Khashram said: ‘We were with [Sufyān] Ibn ‘Uyayna and he said, ‘al-Zuhrī said’. He was asked: ‘Did you hear from al-Zuhrī?’ He fell silent and then said, ‘al-Zuhrī said.’ Then someone asked him, ‘Did you hear it from al-Zuhrī?’ He replied: ‘No, I did not hear it from al-Zuhrī nor from whoever heard from al-Zuhrī. ‘Abd al-Razzāq told me from Ma’mar from al-Zuhrī.’
Hence in this example, Ibn ‘Uayna dropped two narrators between himself and al-Zuhri though he gave the impression he did by saying ‘al-Zuhri said’ (Ibn al-Salāḥ 1986, 73-74).

Sufyān Ibn ‘Uayna committed tadlīs when purporting to have heard from al-Zuhri. This was a one-off example from him and, generally, it did not tarnish his reputation. It cannot be said that committing tadlīs once renders all of the reporters’ narrations null and void. It is well known amongst the Muslims that the two Sufyāns (Ibn ‘Uayna and Thawrī) are credible reporters (Kamali 2005, 105), to the extent that Muslim declares him as one of the ‘imāms of tradition’ in the introduction to his Ṣaḥīḥ (Juynboll 1996, III: 270). In the same text, al-Imām Muslim implicitly suggests that tadlīs is to some extent tolerable:

‘Abd Allāh ibn al-Mubārak said: ‘What an excellent man Baqīya ibn al-Walīd is! If he could only refrain from his habit of calling transmitters by their kunyas when they are better known by their names, and calling transmitters by their names when they are better known by their kunyas. In the past he transmitted traditions from Abū Sa‘īd al-Wuḥāzī; when we looked into this, we found that he referred to ‘Abd al-Quddūs ibn Habīb’ (Juynboll 1996, III: 290)

As the above explanation has shown, this practice is known as tadlīs al-shuyūkh. But the comments of Ibn al-Mubārak suggest that Baqīya did not deserve to be discredited on this basis alone.
5. 21.3. Conclusion.

Whilst acknowledging the depth of criticism directed at tadlīs by the likes of al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī, an equal case could be made for their over-precautioness. The unease surrounding the acceptance of tadlīs is on the basis that the mudallis may not have heard the report directly. So as a precaution, the ḥadīth masters prefer to dislike such a practice. Whilst a case can be made for the fraudulent nature of tadlīs, an equal one can be made suggesting an over-cautious nature of the ḥadīth masters.

In explaining this type, Ibn Ḥajar skilfully admits both opinions. In the Nuzhah, he does this by firstly dividing the drop in the chain into the hidden drop and the concealed drop. In doing so, he is showing the vast array of tools and methods that were available to the ḥadīth masters in stopping fraud and forgery. This suggests confidence in the system employed by his predecessors.

For instance, a check on the biographical information of the shaykh and narrator can identify whether the two reporters lived in the same period and whether they lived or visited a certain area. Historical sources can be analysed to check the dates of birth, when they passed away, when they studied and the period and place of their travels. An example of spotting an apparent drop is provided by al-Munāwī when he writes:

Ḥākim said: ‘When Abū Ja‘far al-Kasshī came to us and claimed that he had reported from ‘Abd Allāh ibn Ḥumayd, I asked him of his birth-date. He mentioned that it was in 260. I said to our companions: ‘This shaykh heard from ‘Abd Allāh ibn Ḥumayd thirteen years after he died!’ (1999, 2: 8)
But importantly, in explaining the concealed drop (to which mudallas belongs), Ibn Ḥajar is accepting that there were cases where such tools were insufficient to stop the forgers. Sometimes, checking the biographical information of the reporters did not help in identifying the genuine cases of transmission from the fraudulent ones.

This can be viewed as a very pragmatic stance from Ibn Ḥajar and an admission of his realism. Whilst accepting the sincerity of the methods employed by early Muslims, he also admits their fallibility. And when we read the text of the Nuzhah – which was most likely aimed at readers of ḥadīth for the first time – then we appreciate the fine line that he took as a writer. He wanted the reader to be aware of the skills employed by the early Muslims in stopping isnād fraud, but to also warn of how sometimes the forgers were a step ahead. In short, the Nuzhah’s section on mudallas is a fine balance between an admission of forgery in the system, and a willingness to uproot it. It is also an indication of Ibn Ḥajar’s skill as a good writer in that he captures mudallas, the positive and negative of it, in a delicate manner.

5. 22. Mursal khafi - the Hidden Loose.

Also [rejected] is mursal khafi when it emits from a contemporary who has not met the one he reports from, but rather between him and the [alleged] reporter is a gap [of another reporter]. The difference between mudallas and mursal khafi is intrinsic; this explanation can be outlined with that which is mentioned here. Tadlīs is specific to the narration from someone he is known to have met. As for when he is the contemporary of him and his meeting with the narrator is not known, then this is mursal khafi. Whoever has added in the definition of tadlīs of ‘being a contemporary even if they have not met’ has thus necessitated including mursal khaṭṭī in the definition [too], though the correct [opinion] is that there is a difference between the two. The evidence that indicates consideration of having met in tadlīs – and not just being mere contemporaries – is the agreement of the people of knowledge in ḥadīth that the reports of the mukhadramūn, like Abū ‘Uthmān al-Nahdī and Qays ibn Abī Ḥāzmīm, from the Prophet ☪ are classified as irsāl and not tadlīs. If being the contemporaries was sufficient in tadlīs, then these [people] would be mudalliss, because they certainly lived in the time of the Prophet ☪ but it is not known if they met him or not. Amongst the scholars who have agreed with the [condition of] meeting in [the definition of] tadlīs are al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī and Abū Bakr al-Bazzār and the writings of al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī in al-Kīfāya stipulate this. This is the trusted opinion.

The absence of meeting is identified by the reporter himself informing such, or by the firm statement of a versed imām.120 It is not sufficient that an addition of one reporter or more occurs in some variations, because of the possibility that this is an addition.121 Thus in this form, a definitive ruling will not be applied because of the conflicting possibility of continuation and discontinuation [of the īsnād]. Verily al-Khaṭīb [al-Baghdādī] has compiled a book on this called al-Tafsīl li-mubham al-marāṣīl and al-Mażīd fi muttaṣīl al-asānīd.

120 For example, Ibn Māja narrated from Ḥārīm ‘Abd al-‘Azīz from ‘Uqba ibn Ṭāfi‘ up to the Prophet that ‘May Allah have mercy upon the guard of the army’. Al-Mizzī writes in al-ʿAtrāf that ‘Umar did not meet ‘Uqba (al-Munāwī 1999, 2: 26)

121 One may assume that when comparing two reports – one with an additional reporter in the chain and one with the absence of that person – it must mean that the latter report is mursal khaṭī. Ibn Ḥajar warns against jumping to such a swift conclusion in such circumstances. This is because the ḥadīth with an additional reporter may simply have an extra reporter in the chain, which is called al-mażīd fī muttaṣīl al-asānīd (section 5.30). Thus, it is difficult in such cases to decree the report as being continuous or discontinuous until stronger evidence arises.
And with this, the types based on the drop in the chain conclude.

Commentary

5. 22. 1. Mursal khafī and how it differs from mudallas

Ibn Ḥajar explains that there is a slight difference between mursal khafī and mudallas. In tadlīs, the narrator has met the narrator, whereas in mursal khafī the narrator is a contemporary of the missing person, but he has not met him.

The Nuzhah accommodates the other minority opinions on the issue too. Some scholars have said that tadlīs is where they are contemporaries, even if they have not met. But Ibn Ḥajar rightly points out that if this definition is accepted, then it is the same as mursal khafī. Perhaps it is out of respect that he does not mention who these people are; it is in fact his teacher al-ʿIrāqī and al-Nawawī (al-Qārī 1994, 425).

Two pieces of evidence are provided for this majority opinion by Ibn Ḥajar. Firstly he writes that the narrations of the mukhadramūn – those who lived in the time of the Prophet and prior to it in the time of jāhiliyya but were not known to have physically met him – are unanimously considered as mursal khafī, and not tadlīs. If for tadlīs being mere contemporaries was sufficient, then they would be termed as mudallises, because they were contemporaries of the Prophet ⚪, but never met him. But no one refers to them with this term.

Secondly, Ibn Ḥajar cites the opinions of previous scholars who agree with him on this issue, such as al-Imām Shāfīʿī, Abū Bakr al-Bazzār and al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī.

122 See Section 5.42.
This last ‘evidence’ needs closer analysis. We have observed places in the Nuzhah already where Ibn Ḥajar cites the opinions of past, ḥadīth masters in order to show how his own views correspond with theirs. For instance:

a. In section 5.7.1., he argues that what the two *shaykh*s have recorded gives the benefit of controvertible knowledge, and that al-Ḥumaydī, Abū al-Faḍl ibn Ṭāhir and others too agree to this.

b. In the same section, he writes that a mashhūr report is considered an advantageous factor. This complies with the opinion of Abū Maḥṣūr al-Baghdādī and Abū Bakr ibn Fūrak, he asserts.

c. In the section on the addition of reliable narrators (5.10.2.), he shows that his opinion is the same as many of the classical ḥadīth masters, like Yahyā al-Qaṭṭān, Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal, Yahyā ibn Ma‘īn, ‘Alī ibn al-Madīnī, al-Bukhārī, al-Nasā’ī, al-Dāraquṭnī and others.

Realistically speaking, there could be two reasons for Ibn Ḥajar cites the opinion of his predecessors on contentious matters. Firstly, it could be simply a sign of good academia. The issues he refers to in the Nuzhah have been debated for centuries and so it makes sense to alert the reader of past opinions on the matter.

Secondly, Ibn Ḥajar is alerting the reader of the importance of seniority in ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. The fact that scholars like Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal, Yahyā ibn Ma‘īn and ‘Alī ibn al-Madīnī have agreed (or disagreed on a matter) is as good as empirical and objective evidence. In this particular section on mursal khāfī, this is precisely what Ibn Ḥajar has done; mudallas is different from mursal khāfī because al-Imām al-Shāfī‘ī, Abū Bakr al-Bazzār and al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī said so. As an introduction to the discipline, the Nuzhah encourages the disciple to respect the classical ḥadīth masters and their opinions. Though seemingly not important, this point has larger ramifications felt elsewhere in the discipline. For example, should a Muslim feel uncomfortable with the fact that the Muwatṭa’ contains 1720 reports, of which 295 are simply the opinions of Mālik? Most Muslims would not. After all, they will argue, he was a pious, ḥadīth master whose endeavours in Islam will forever be appreciated. Therefore, his opinion is of great significance. To the non-Muslim observer, it is more of a concern.

5. 23. Reasons for defamation in the tradition.

Then the defamation is with ten things, some are worse than others in severity. Five from them pertain to the integrity (‘adāla) [of the reporter] and five pertain to the accuracy (ḍabṭ). Care for the [separation] of each type has not been done [here in the text] for a reason; this is to arrange [these ten] from the worse in terms of rejection downwards. [The division varies] because the defamation is either because of the lying of the narrator in a Prophetic report, in that he deliberately narrates something from the Prophet which he did not say. Or [the rejection is due to] accusation of lying, in that the ḥadīth has not been reported except by him and that it contradicts known principles; and similarly the reporter is known to lie in his [everyday] conversation though his lying has not been proven in Prophetic traditions. This [type] is less than the first [in terms of severity]. Or [the rejection is due to] his obscene mistakes, meaning plentiful [mistakes]. Or [the rejection is due to] his negligence of accuracy. Or [the rejection is due to] his lewdness in action or sayings when it does not reach the stage of disbelief. Between this and the first (i.e. the lie) is [a difference] of generality. The former has been mentioned separately because the defamation in it is worse in this discipline [of ‘ilm al-hadīth]. As for lewdness in terms of doctrine, its explanation will follow soon. Or [the rejection is due to] his doubts, in that he reports ambiguously. Or [the rejection is due to] opposition, namely of the authoritative narrators. Or [the rejection is due to] his ignorance, in that his credibility or lack of it is not identified clearly. Or [the rejection is due to] his innovative beliefs; and this is belief in something which contradicts the established from the Prophet ﷺ, not out of conviction but with a shade of doubt. Or [the rejection is due to] is bad memory, an expression to mean his mistakes are more than his corrections.

Commentary

The above paragraph serves as an introduction to the next section. The author writes that there are ten primary reasons for defamation in the narrator; five are related to the integrity (‘adāla) of the narrator and five are related to his/her accuracy (dabt).

The five related to integrity are:

a. Lying.
b. Accusation of lying.
c. Lewd behaviour.
d. Ignorance of the narrator.
e. Innovation.

The five related to accuracy are;
a. Severe mistakes.
b. Negligence.
c. Opposing authoritative narrators.
d. Bad memory.
e. Excessive doubt.

Ibn Ḥajar writes that in his forthcoming explanation of each type, he will not present them in order of those rejected on the basis of lack of integrity and then those rejected based on the lack of accuracy. Rather, as he clarifies in the text, he prefers to mention them in order of the most severe to the least severe, commencing with the fabricated or forged tradition.

5. 24. Mawdū‘- the Forged.

Thus the first type – and this is defamation due to the lying of the reporter in the Prophetic tradition – is mawdū‘. The declaration of forgery is merely by the means of overwhelming evidence and not definitive [knowledge], since [even] the liar sometimes tells the truth. [To combat forgery] the people of knowledge in [‘ilm] al-ḥadīth possess a strong ability to differentiate the reports [from the sound]. Only those scholars whose knowledge is comprehensive, whose intellect is penetrating, whose insight is complete and whose knowledge of the different indications of forgery is sound can stand [successfully] in this field.

Sometimes the forgery is identified by the admission of the forger. Ibn Daqīq al-Īd said: ‘But that [confession] will not be considered definitively due to the possibility of him lying in the confession.’ Some have understood from this [statement] that his confession will not be acted upon at all, because he is a liar. But this is not what he meant. He only negated accepting it definitively. And negating it definitively does not result in negating its ruling, because a ruling can be made with overwhelming evidence, as is the case here. If this was not the case, then it would not be permissible to apply capital punishment to the confessor of murder, nor to the confessor of adultery, due to the possibility of their lying in their confession.

Amongst the indications by which the forged is identified is that which is found in the state of the reporter, like what occurred to Ma’mūn ibn Aḥmad; in his presence the debate of whether Ḥasan has heard from Abū Hurayra was mentioned. Thus he read an isnād immediately to the Prophet ﷺ, who [allegedly] said: ‘Ḥasan heard from Abū Hurayra.’ Similar to this is what occurred with Ghiyāth ibn Ibrāhīm when he entered upon al-Mahdī who was playing with his pigeons. Immediately, he read an isnād up to the Prophet ﷺ, who [allegedly] said: ‘There is no competition except in archery, camel racing, horse racing and pigeon racing.’ He had added the words ‘and pigeon racing’ [himself]. Al-Mahdī knew that he had lied for his sake and thus ordered the pigeons to be killed.

Amongst the indicating factors [by which the forged is identified] is the state of the text, such as contradicting the text of the Qur’ān or the mutawātir sunna, or the firm consensus or the clear, common sense in a manner that [harmonising] interpretation is not possible.

Then the reporter sometimes invents the text and sometimes he takes the dialogue from others [and then ascribes it to the Prophet], like [the words of] some of the pious predecessors, or the ancient wise or from biblical sources. Or he sometimes takes a weak-chained ḥadīth and invents a sound isnād for it so it can circulate.
The reasons for the forger to fabricate are either the absence of religion, like the zindīqīs (disbelievers); or the prevalence of ignorance, like some worshippers; or some adherents [to a madhhab]; or in pursuit of pleasing some leaders; or rarity with the intention of attaining fame. All such acts are forbidden by consensus of [all the scholars] considered in it. However, it has been reported from some Karrāmiyya and some Şūfs the permissibility of lying in the area of tarrhib and tarhib (instilling virtue and inspiring fear). This is the mistake from the one who does it and it stems from ignorance. This is because tarrhib and tarhib too are part of the rulings of shari'a. The scholars are unanimous that deliberately ascribing a lie to the Prophet is from the major [sins]. Abū Muḥammad al-Juwaynī has over-emphasised [this ruling] by decreeing the deliberate forger a disbeliever. The scholars have agreed on the prohibition of reporting a forged report, except by explaining its forgery, due to the saying of the Prophet :‘If anyone narrated a ḥadīth from me which he knew was fabricated, then he is one of the liars’. Al-Imām Muslim reported this.

5.24.1. Forged (Fabricated Traditions); an introduction. 123

No field of ḥadīth literature has been the focus for non-Muslim academics, or a cause for concern for Muslims more than mawdū’, forged (or fabricated traditions). It is, for most 123 The section on the Forged is in part taken from ‘The Characteristics of a Ḥadīth Narrator, with reference to the al-Jāmi’ of al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī (d. 463/1071)’ a thesis submitted to the University of Birmingham for the Degree of Master of Philosophy, by Ather Hussain in November 2005.

part, the Achilles heel for Muslims. From a very early period, up until today, the subject has roused a vast array of opinions and controversy.

This extensive section will begin with a definition of mawdū‘ and a brief explanation of how it differs from da‘īf. Then, there will be a short outline of when forgery in prophetic traditions begun, who the fabricators were and the methods they employed. Then it will be shown what was done to stop and detect fabricated traditions, and prevent its circulation. The chapter will conclude by assessing the extent of mawdū‘’s in ḥadīth literature.

5. 24. 2. Defining mawdū‘.

A mawdū‘ is a fabricated or forged tradition, a report which cannot be described as a saying or action of the Prophet. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ defines it as al-mukhtalāq al-maṣnū‘, meaning ‘created and fabricated’ (1986, 98) and al-Suyūṭī defined it too with these same words (1972, 1: 274).

It is imperative that a distinction is made between da‘īf (weak) and mawdū‘ (fabricated traditions). Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ defines the former as ‘any ḥadīth which does not fulfill the aforementioned conditions of ṣahīh or ḥasan’ (1986, 41). In other words, a da‘īf tradition does have some foundation to its authenticity, whereas a mawdū‘ has no foundation or basis whatsoever. This is the reason why some Muslim scholars do not consider mawdū‘ as a type of ḥadīth at all, and consider it external to the discussion on ḥadīth criticism. Al-Ṣāliḥ, for instance, writes that mawdū‘ can only be labelled as a type of ḥadīth in the investigative stage, when one is determining whether there is any authenticity in the report. Once it has been established as forged, then it should be referred to as mawḍūʿ and not al-ḥadīth al-mawḍūʿ (1999, 142).

The fundamental difference between ḍaʿīf (weak) and mawḍūʿ (fabricated traditions) is most apparent when the ruling concerning its narration and transmission is analysed. It is, according to most scholars, permissible to narrate and circulate ḍaʿīf traditions. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ writes:

According to the scholars of ḥadīth, it is permissible to adopt leniency in the ishnād and in the narration of ḍaʿīf traditions, other than mawḍūʿ traditions, without having to explain its weakness. This is not [however] where the text deals with the attributes of Allāh, or Islamic rulings like the forbidden and permitted things. It is [only] permissible where the text refers to admonition, stories, the superiority of certain actions and in all areas of preaching [al-targhib wa-al-tarhīb]. Amongst the scholars who have reported leniency with such narrations are ‘Ābd al-Raḥmān ibn Mahdī and Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal (1986, 103).

So, for example, a Muslim would be allowed to use ḍaʿīf narrations to extol the virtues of charitable donations but not to prove a fundamental tenet of Islam.

With mawḍūʿ however, all scholars unanimously agree that transmitting such narrations is strictly forbidden. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī confirms this fact in the chapter entitled ‘The Prohibition of narrating fabricated tales and the necessity of discarding forged traditions’ (my italics) (1996, 2: 134). Later scholars too reiterated this view, including Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ (1986, 98), al-Suyūṭī (1972, 1: 274) and Ibn Ḥajar here in the Nuzhah.
It seems the distinction between daʿīf and mawdūʿ has been a source of long-standing confusion, rather than an issue which has come to light recently. Al-Suyūṭī condemned Ibn al-Jawzī on his work on fabrications, al-Mawdūʿāt. Al-Suyūṭī writes:

[Ibn al-Jawzī] has exaggerated the number of fabricated traditions in his two-volumed book al-Mawdūʿāt, which contains many traditions which have no basis to be referred to as fabricated, but daʿīf, ṣahīh and ḥasan. Stranger still is the fact he has included a ḥadīth of Muslim [as being fabricated] (1972, 1: 280).

Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ was reported to have showed similar dismay with the findings of Ibn al-Jawzī (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 99). What this tells us is that historically, certain scholars have erroneously confused the two.

To conclude therefore, a clear distinction must be made between the usage of the terms daʿīf (weak) and mawdūʿ (fabricated traditions). The former is rejected though it can be used in certain areas of preaching. The latter is rejected too but cannot be used at all and in fact has no real right to be referred to as a prophetic tradition.

5.24.3. When did the forging of traditions begin?

There is no unanimous opinion on when exactly the practice of forging traditions began. William Muir believed it began in the caliphate of ʿUthmān (cited in Siddiqī 1993, 32). Siddiqi writes that intermittent examples of fabrications were found in the time of the Prophet and during the caliphate of Abū Bakr (1993, 32). On the basis of the prophetic report ‘Let whoever tells lies about me deliberately take his place in hell’, Brown concludes that ‘…this can be taken to mean that Muḥammad knew that there were those among his Companions who were spreading lies about him’ (1999, 85).

Al-Sibā‘ī believes that the year forty was the dividing point between the ‘purity of the sunna from lies and forgery’ (1998, 92). He adds that it is extremely difficult to believe that the Companions would forge traditions on a large scale, in the time of the Prophet and immediately after. Instead, it was the subsequent events between ‘Alī and Mu‘āwiya which resulted in the first serious assault on the sunna of the Prophet (1998, 93-5). Muir too voices a similar opinion (1858, I: xxxix), as does al-Ṣāliḥ when he said that forgery begun in the year forty one, in the Caliphate of ‘Alī. (al-Ṣāliḥ 1999, 266). Goldziher points out that al-Muhallab (d. 83/702) forged traditions, which, if true, makes him one of the earliest fabricators of ḥadīth (1971, 52).

It is perhaps easier to identify when fabricated traditions became a major issue in Islam, rather than attempting to pinpoint when exactly it started. Mālik (d. 179/795) did not allow fabricators under the disguise of story-tellers into the Prophet’s Mosque in Madina (Ṣiddiqī 1993, 35). Ḥammād ibn Zayd (98/716-179/795) famously said that the heretics had fabricated fourteen thousand traditions (al-Suyūṭī 1972 I: 284). What is clear from 124 The example he refers to is recorded by al-Suyūṭī, which describes a man called Jadjad who desired to marry a woman from a far-off tribe. He approached the tribe leaders and told him he had authority from the Prophet in Madina. The tribe leaders checked the authenticity of the report by sending someone to the Prophet to enquire further. When the falsity of the report became apparent, the Prophet ordered his followers to find the liar. If they were to found him alive, they were to kill him. If they were to find him dead they were to burn his body. Before the followers of the Prophet reached him, Jadjad was killed by a snake bite (al-Suyūṭī 1998, 2: 136).

both of these references is that by the middle of the second Islamic century, forgery was a serious problem.

In light of all the vast arrays of opinion regarding when exactly forgery began, it can be said with some certainty that other than a handful of sporadic examples, the forgery of prophetic traditions was not widespread in the lifetime of the Prophet, or immediately after it. By the end of the first Islamic century however, it was evident enough to be considered a source of anxiety for hadīth scholars.

5.24.4. Who were the fabricators?

Clearly, the culprits who forged traditions did not fit a particular description and instead took on a number of different disguises. The main categories of fabricators were;

a. The pious traditionists.

Al-Sibāʿī writes that a considerable number of Muslims who were known for their piety and devotion to Islam fabricated traditions. The aim was to encourage people to perform righteous actions (1998, 104). Ordinary Muslims would judge their outwardly character and consequently accept their tales as authentic. How could someone accuse a Muslim of fabricating traditions, when, like the example of Abū Dāwūd al-Nakhaʿī, they would spend the entire night in Prayer and the entire day in fast? (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 283). For this reason, the ḥadīth masters considered this category of fabricators as the worst, because of their contradiction between outlook and practice (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 281: Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 99).
There are no shortages of such examples. Al-Suyūṭī writes that Nūḥ ibn Abī Maryam had fabricated several traditions, by falsely using the chain of Ibn ‘Abbās. Most of the reports he forged were regarding the superiority of different chapters of the Qur’ān. When the ḥadīth specialists uncovered his antics and asked what had driven him to such behaviour, he replied: ‘I saw people turning away from the Qur’ān and becoming immersed in the fiqh of Abū Ḥanīfa and the Maghāzī of Ibn Ishāq. So I fabricated these traditions’ (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 282; Azami 1977, 69).126

This oft-repeated quote from Nūḥ does not comply with the writings of Goldziher, who wrote that the early Umayyad period was marked by ‘the promotion of profane literature’ (1971, 189). He adds that Muḥammad ibn Isḥāq ‘had the merit of diverting the princes from occupying themselves with books that were of no use and turning their attention to the conquests of the Prophet, his mission and the beginning of creation’ (1971, 190). Nūḥ disagrees because he noted the lack of attention to prophetic literature was because of the unhealthy obsession with the Maghāzī of Ibn Ishāq. For Goldziher, Ibn Isḥāq marked the return to the ḥadīth literature; for Nūḥ he marked the diversion from it.

This aside, however, the Muslim and non-Muslim academics agree: that the pious traditionists did forge reports. Where they differ is the reason behind it. The above analysis shows that the Muslim academics believe they forged them for religious purposes. The Westerners, particularly Goldziher, believe that they forged reports to fight the tyrant Umayyad regime.

126 Maysara ibn ‘Abd Rabbihi was another devout character who forged fabrications. To the ordinary masses, he was known as an ascetic and pious Muslim. In fact, on the day he died the shops of Baghdad closed in his respect. Despite this, he forged countless traditions relating to the superiority of certain chapters of the Qur’ān and the superiority of ‘Alī (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 282).
b. Heretics (zindīqs).

In an attempt to confuse unrest and confusion, many non-Muslims – often of Manichean leanings (Siddiqi 1993, 33) – forged traditions and diluted them into the mainstream sayings and traditions of the Prophet. Ḥāmmad ibn Zayd comments that the zindīqs fabricated in the region of fourteen thousand traditions in the name of the Prophet. ‘Ābd al-Karīm ibn Abī al-‘Awjā was caught and as he was about to be executed, confessed that he personally had forged four-thousand traditions (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 284).

c. Story-tellers (quṣṣāṣ)

This category of fabricators probably gained prominence early on in the history of Islam. To attract a larger audience as possible and to achieve fame and fortune, the story tellers would attempt to narrate the strangest and most amusing stories. Often this meant forging reports and attributing them to the sayings of the Prophet (Siddiqi 1993, 34). Al-Sibā‘ī adds that unfortunately, rather than ousting them from the public eye, the Muslims merely fuelled their antics by attending such events (1998, 104).

d. Sectarian groups.

Al-Sibā‘ī writes that political and religious indifferences was perhaps the main catalyst in the diffusion of fabricated traditions (1998, 96). The Rāfīḍīs and Shī‘as were undoubtedly responsible for seeking assistance for their innovative beliefs by the fabrications of traditions. Ḥāmmād ibn Zayd once said that a shaykh from the Rāfīḍīs had personally told him that they would hold gatherings to fabricate traditions (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 275).
One Muslim belonging to a sectarian group reverted from his beliefs and confessed: ‘Pay attention to whom you take narrations from, for when we adopted any opinion, we would forge it into a ḥadīth’ (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 275). Al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī too was aware of the Rāfiḍīs’s tendencies to forge traditions and warned they were the most likely to ascribe lies to the Prophet (cited in al-Sibā‘ī 1998, 96).

e. Other categories of fabricators.

The above four categories account for the majority of the fabricators in early Islam. There were however other groups who were spurred by other motives. Some for instance forged traditions to achieve proximity to political personalities. Ghiyāth ibn Ibrāhīm, an associate of al-Mahdī, forged a tradition regarding racing pigeons to please him (al-Sibā‘ī 1998, 105). In the Nuzhah, Ibn Ḥajar mentions this example and adds that one of the reasons why Muslims in the past fabricated was ‘in pursuit of pleasing some leaders.’ Therefore there is substantial substance in Goldziher’s view that politics played a major role in the fabrication of prophetic reports. Azami, on the other hand, totally dismisses such a possibility. When discussing the different types of forgers that existed, he wrote:

Scholars mention a class of fabricators who used to fabricate for the sake of rulers.

It is very remarkable that one finds only one example [i.e. Ghiyāth ibn Ibrāhīm’s pigeon-racing report] of this sort which has been repeated by the scholars (Azami 1977, 69).
Another minor group of fabricators were those who forged traditions to support a particular school of thought, or a particular disputed religious issue. For example, one person forged a tradition proclaiming Abū Ḥanīfa as the ‘lantern of the umma’ and simultaneously degrading al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī as ‘more harmful than the devil’ (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 278). Another forged tradition claimed that a person who denies that the Qur’ān was created (makhlūq) exits the fold of Islam (al-Sibā’ī 1998, 105).

In short, it is clear that the ḥadīth masters had an additional problem in dealing with forged traditions in that they did not fit any one particular category. The above analysis shows they often came from all walks of life, with various motives.

5. 24. 5. The method of the fabricators.

Ibn Ḥajar comments in the Nuzhah that the fabricators had two main methods. Either they would forge the text themselves, or would take a saying of pious individuals, traditional leaders or Christians and Jews and ascribe it to the Prophet. Most forged traditions were of the former type (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 277).

5. 24. 6. Fabricated Traditions; A problem out of control?

It is easy to readily assume that the issue of forged traditions spiralled out of control and the ḥadīth masters had no means to prevent it spreading. This is the conclusion many have made including Brown. He writes:
…the muḥaddithūn, no matter how dedicated, were simply too distant from the time of the Prophet, and forgery had become too rampant, for authentic ḥadīth to be recovered (1999, 96).

However, one must not neglect the fact that the ḥadīth masters had several means to detect fabrications and to sift the authentic sayings from the forged ones. If the problem of forgery was extensive, the ḥadīth masters’ efforts to identify them were also extensive and long-reaching. Also, as it will be shown, perhaps many have exaggerated (Muslims and non-Muslims) the extent of the problem.

So far, an account has been given of who the fabricators were and the methods they employed. It has been conclusively shown that the ḥadīth masters were up against a vast array of fabricators who did not fit one particular description. Moreover, the ḥadīth masters had to deal with a century or more of forgeries. In this next section, it will be shown how the ḥadīth masters tackled the problem, and how, for Muslims at least, the problem was not as epidemic as many assumed.

a. Confessions of the fabricators.

Quite often, the guilty narrators themselves confessed to their crimes and gave themselves up to the authorities. Nūḥ ibn Abī Maryam fabricated countless traditions relating to the superiority of different chapters of the Qur’ān. Eventually, he came forward and confessed to the fabrications (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 282; al-Sibā’ī 1998, 105; Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 100). Maysara, another narrator who forged traditions concerning the Qurʾān, too confessed (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 274). Hence, occasionally the ḥadīṯ masters did not have to do anything to tackle the problem of forgeries.

b. Biographical research by the ḥadīṯ masters.

This method was to check the validity of the report by investigating when the narrator heard the tradition from the shaykh. The ḥadīṯ master would then cross-reference the claim with each of the individuals’ birth dates, dates of travel and death date. History testifies that this was an exceptionally useful tool to prevent fabrications. For example, Ma’mūn ibn Aḥmad al-Harawī claimed that he had heard from Hishām ibn ‘Ammār. Ibn Ḥībbān asked him when he went to Syria to take the narration. He replied in the year 250. Ibn Ḥībbān replied: ‘The Hishām you heard from died in 245’ (al-Sībāʾī 1998, 115). ‘Abd Allāh ibn Isḥāq al-Kirmanī reportedly heard from Muḥammad ibn Abī Yāʿqūb. He was told that Muḥammad died nine years before he was born (al-Sībāʾī 1998, 115-6).

There are many such examples given by the Muslim scholars. It shows how ʿilm al-rijāl did play a role in the prevention and detection of fabrications. ʿIlm al-rijāl never claimed to cover every aspect of a reporter’s life. But it did certainly help in providing the basic biographical dates of the reporters, which then helped immensely in validating claims of transmission. It may have been ‘only an approximate science’ and sometimes ‘flawed’, like Brown described it (1999, pp. 96-7), but this field of knowledge did serve some function.

Perhaps the saying of Sufyān al-Thawrī epitomises the usefulness of applying historical data to identify forgery. ‘When the narrators began lying’ he remarked, ‘we began using history against them’ (cited in al-Sībāʾī 1998, 115).
c. Indication in the narrator.

Ibn Ḥajar writes that the condition and circumstances of the narrator sometimes suggests the ḥadīth is fabricated. He cites the example of Ghiyāth who forged a tradition regarding pigeon racing. Al-Mahdī was playing with pigeons at the time. Al-Suyūṭī writes that if the matn of the ḥadīth is regarding the family of the Prophet, and the narrator is a Rāfidī, then this also gives reasons for the ḥadīth master to believe the report is fabricated (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 276). For example, one report they forged was where the Prophet was supposed to have said: ‘When you see Mu‘āwiya on the throne, kill him’ (al-Sibā‘ī 1998, 98).

Thus sometimes the circumstances of the narrator clearly suggest that tradition has no basis.

d. Indication in the matn of the ḥadīth.

Muslims assert that if one assumes it was simple to fabricate a few words and then simply ascribe it to the Prophet, it was most certainly not easy to fabricate a few words which resembled the words of the Prophet. After all, the Prophet was gifted with a unique command of the Arabic language, able to convey a message with striking effect and eloquence (‘Iyāḍ 2002, 48). What this meant was that more often than not, the words of the Prophet could be easily distinguished from the word of others.

The ḥadīth scholars had many ways of detecting forgeries from looking at the text of the ḥadīth. These included;
a. The text contradicts the Qur’an, the established and proven sunna, the unanimous consensus and common sense (Ibn Ḥajar 1995, 71; Siddiqi 1993, 114). Earlier it was mentioned how the heretics (zindiqs) had forged fourteen thousand traditions. For most part, they contradicted the basic tenets of Islam and thus its forgery was readily identifiable, even by the most amateur of scholars. For example, one tradition claimed that Noah’s Ark circled the Ka‘ba seven times and read two units of Prayer at the Station of Ibrāhīm (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 279; al-Sibā‘ī 1998, 117). Clearly, this defies logic and common sense.

b. The text refers to a substantially large reward for a relatively small action, or refers to a severe punishment for a relatively trivial error (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 276). Storytellers were identified earlier as known forgers, and very often their crime were uncovered because of the blatant discrepancy between action and reward. An example is the forged tradition:

> When someone reads ‘there is no God but Allāh’, Allāh then creates a bird for him which has seventy thousand tongues. Each tongue of the bird can speak seventy thousand languages and they all seek forgiveness for the person (al-Sibā‘ī 1998, 120).

Al-Sibā‘ī adds that the fabrications of storytellers were simple to identify because the meaning was far-fetched and contrary to common sense (1998, 103). Muir believes that fabrications could be identified by:
…the attempts of narrators to exaggerate their labours and exploits, and to multiply their losses and perils, in the service of the Prophet and of Islam. (Muir 1858, I; LX)

c. Traditions which contain detailed prophecies of future events, equipped with dates (Siddiqi 1993, 114).
d. Traditions in which the matn violate the basic rules of Arabic grammar and style (Ibid.).
e. Traditions that describe the excellence of certain chapters of the Qur’ân and mention the superior virtues of persons, tribes and particular places should also be viewed with some scepticism, according to Siddiqi (1993, 114).

What this proves is that matn criticism did exist in some form. Brown quotes Sayyid Aḥmad Khān who argues that the ḥadīth masters were so concerned only with the continuity of transmission and the character of the transmitters that they completely ignored the subject matter of the traditions and failed to look at either internal or historical evidence (1999, 97). A similar opinion has been voiced from Schacht (1959, 3). But what the above analysis shows is that the ḥadīth masters did take matn criticism on board, and that it played some role in rooting out the authentic reports from the forged. This is certainly the case with the reports extolling the virtue of certain chapters in the Qur’ân (Azami 1977, 69).

Likewise, when a report mentioned a specific event, the scholars could validate it by analysing whether it complied with the proven dates. For example, one hadīth reports that the Prophet levied tax (jizya) on the people of Khaybar but spared them doing unpaid labour, upon the testimony of Sa‘d ibn Mu‘ādh and written advice of Mu‘āwiya. History testifies that this report must be fabricated: jizya was not introduced in the year of Khaybar, but after the Battle of Tabūk. Moreover, Sa‘d died before this and Mu‘āwiya did not accept Islam until much later, at the conquest of Makka (al-Sibā‘ī 1998, 118).

e. The intuitive method.

So far, the formal and objective methods of detecting forged traditions have been mentioned. However, perhaps the most useful yet unscientific tool the ḥadīth masters possessed in the fight against forgery was the intuitive method.

The ḥadīth masters had accumulated and learnt thousands of traditions of the Prophet. Yahyā ibn Ma‘in had written six-hundred thousand prophetic reports (al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī 1996, 2: 255). Abū Zur‘ā had written two-hundred thousand prophetic reports (al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī 1996, 2: 256). Al-Bukhārī knew in the region of seven-hundred thousand traditions. In fact, most of the ḥadīth masters had learnt over one-hundred thousand traditions. This had enabled them to develop an acute appreciation of the style of prophetic speech and his actions. Years of studying the sayings and actions of the Prophet had bestowed them the instinctive ability to identify his sayings and differentiate them from the sayings and actions of others. Thus, the detection of forgery became second nature. Their intuition could immediately help to identify which sayings could be accurately described as being prophetic.

Ibn Daqīq al-‘Īd was an early advocate of this method. He stated that owing to the depth and length of their studies, the ḥadīth masters could easily appreciate what the Prophet could and could not have said (al-Sibā‘i 1998, 116-7). Al-Imām Bulqinī too was of the same opinion when he said that when a servant serves a master for a number of years, he gains an understanding of what the master likes or dislikes. When someone claims that the master likes a certain object, the slave can instantly and instinctively vouch for the authenticity of the claim (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 276; al-Sibā‘ī 1998, 117). Azami writes:

Scholars who spent a great deal of their lives with the hadīth of the Prophet developed a sense which they could use instantly in detecting error. Their example was like that of a man who lived with a beloved friend for scores of years, knew him very well in every situation and so could easily say which statement belonged to him and which not. Similarly, a literary critic who studies a poet for a long time and becomes fully acquainted with his style can, on the basis of his perception and personal experience, easily detect a poem which does not belong to the poet (1977, 71).

Therefore, the ḥadīth masters did not have a huge task on their hand in detecting forgery. Along with the objective tools, their own intuition and instinct was a significant asset. Al-Rabī‘ was most probably referring to the value of the intuitive method when he remarked: ‘the ḥadīth has a light as bright as daylight which helps to identify it…’ (in al-Ṣāliḥ 1999, 264). It also explains Ibn al-Mubārak’s response when he was asked about the extent of fabrications. He coolly remarked, ‘the fabrications live with the experts; Indeed we revealed the Remembrance and verily We are its protectors’127 (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 282).

5.24.7. Conclusion.

No scholar – Muslim or non-Muslim – would dare to suggest the problem of forgery in prophetic traditions was of minor significance. It sometimes left the ḥadīth masters baffled and it distorted the portrayal of the sunna. In reply however, one must not neglect the extent of the effort employed by the ḥadīth scholars to fight forgery. Their dedication and devotion in sifting the authentic traditions from the fabricated is unquestioned. Many non-Muslim writers have overlooked their effort and argued that by the time forgery had become common practice, it was too late to save the sunna. In response to this claim, Brown raises an interesting point:

> Who are we to judge, when we are so much farther removed from the events then they [the ḥadīth masters] were? The experts in ḥadīth certainly knew much more than we do. All the research in the world will not turn up anything new that the muhaddithūn did not take into account; any reassessment will therefore amount to nothing but personal opinion. New research cannot change past events (1999, 99).

An additional point to highlight is the discussion of how the issue has been portrayed by Muslims. Undoubtedly, the Muslim scholars took the issue of fabrications very seriously and this was reflected by the effort they exerted to detect it. Perhaps no type of ḥadīth received as much interest and investigation than fabricated traditions. Ibn Ḥajar’s own lengthy analysis reflects how important he viewed it. It is easy therefore to misinterpret the extent of the problem, because of the large amount of care and attention it received from Muslim scholars.\textsuperscript{128}

Hadīth scholars were marked by a large degree of precaution in their work and analysis. Even the slightest doubt was sufficient for a scholar to decree a tradition as not authentic. Perhaps this precaution also resulted in the misinterpretation of the extent of the problem of forged traditions. This is certainly the case with the works of Ibn al-Jawzī, who was severely criticised by al-Suyūṭī\textsuperscript{129} and others for including several authentic traditions in his book devoted to fabricated traditions. Included in this number were traditions to be found in \textit{Sunan Abū Dāwūd}, \textit{Sunan al-Tirmidhī}, \textit{Sunan al-Nasia}, \textit{Sunan Ibn Māja} and even \textit{Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī} (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 278-9). Part of the problem of Ibn al-Jawzī’s work was that he based a large part of it on \textit{al-Abūṭī}, by al-Jūzqānī, who was known to deem any hadīth contrary to the sunna as fabricated (al-Ṣāliḥ 1999, 271). The other factor was that he was prone to rash generalisations. Because \textit{some} forged traditions did certainly exist on the merits of individuals, tribes or towns, he decreed that all or most traditions of this genre too were forged (Kamali 2005, pp. 40-1). This is despite the fact that a large array of authentic traditions do exist on the merits of certain individuals and places.

Likewise, we learn that the likes of al-Аṣmā’ī, Shu’ba and al-‘Abbās ibn al-Mughūra held the view that anyone who studies ḥadīth without learning Arabic grammar is categorised as a forger (Siddiqi 1993, 85). In other words, there are numerous ways a report has been classified as forged when it is clearly not.

Scholars have frequently categorised a certain ḥadīth as mawdūʿ, though in reality it belongs to another type. This too obscures the extent of the problem of forgery. An example of this is mudraj, where a text has been mistakenly inserted by one of the narrators. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ has viewed this type of ḥadīth as a forgery (1986, 100). In his book, he writes: ‘...sometimes forgery happens unintentionally, as what happened to Thābit ibn Mūsā al-ʿĀbid al-Zāhid in the ḥadīth: ‘Whosoever performs Prayer by night, his face is beautiful by day’ (1986, 100).

Scholars are quick to point out that this occurrence falls under the category of mudraj, not mawdūʿ (al-Ṣāliḥ 1999, pp.272-3). Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ wrote that labelling a report as saḥīḥ merely guarantees that the stated conditions are to be found in it (1986, pp.13-14). Likewise, when a report is labelled as ‘not saḥīḥ’ it means that the one or all of the conditions are missing, and not that the report is baseless (Ibid.). Unfortunately, when a particular report has been declared as ‘not saḥīḥ’, some have jumped to the conclusion that it is therefore forged. This, however, is simply not the case, since it could mean it is Fair or Weak. Certainly, Muir (1858) is one such academic who has seemingly fallen into this trap. He cites the famous fact that al-Bukhārī knew six-hundred thousand prophetic reports and deduces that only four thousand from them were authentic, since that is how many he included in his own Sahīḥ (1858, I; xliii). Muir does not entertain the fact that by not being saḥīḥ, the reports could 130 Mudraj will be discussed in section 5.28.

131 The full story is that Thābit ibn Mūsā al-ʿĀbid al-Zāhid entered upon Sharīk whilst he was dictating traditions. As he finished reading a chain, he paused so the auditor could finish writing. When he saw Thābit he said ‘Whosoever performs Prayer by night, his face is beautiful by day’, as a praise of his ascetic qualities and piety. Listeners however thought the words linked to the isnād, and began narrating it as one ḥadīth.
132 In section 5.9.2.
have been fair or weak, rather than forged. When something is described as ‘not being black’, it does not automatically mean it is white: it could be grey, red or blue. Al-Bukhārī made it explicitly clear that he knew of thousands of more sound reports than what he included in his Šaḥīḥ, but did not include them because he feared the compilation would be too long (Khalīfa 1983, 57).¹³³

There is further evidence to suggest the problem of fabrications was not as extensive as suggested. Earlier, it was mentioned that the heretics had fabricated thousands of traditions, including ‘Abd al-Karīm ibn Abī al-‘Awā who confessed to fabricating four thousand traditions. Azami writes that one should be cautious in accepting such confessions, particularly since he was about to be hanged. ‘After [the] confession’, writes Azami, ‘we grade him as a liar. And it might be part of a conspiracy that when that person was unable to destroy the faith of the people in the sunna of the Prophet, he used this final trick’ (1977, 69). Hence, Azami suggests that the heretics perhaps did not fabricate as many traditions they claimed to have.

On a last note, Muslims take comfort in the fact that paradoxically, mawdūʿ proves the authenticity of ḥadīth literature. The existence of mawdūʿ is the biggest proof that early Muslims did not fabricate traditions on a grand-scale as depicted by Schacht and Goldziher. As Robson asks, ‘why were some men blamed for acting dishonestly while others were allowed to do the same thing without any attention being drawn to the fact?’ (in Azami 1992, 243). Or as al-Sibāʾī bluntly asks:

¹³³ Kamali offers an alternative explanation. He writes that the figure of 600,000 was reduced to 9,082 because ‘he has repeated ahādīth which had more than one chain of isnād as the strength and reliability of the isnād is deemed to increase with the plurality of its chains of transmission. When such repetitions are taken into account, the original figure of 600,000 is also likely to be drastically reduced. For a single ḥadīth is sometimes transmitted through ten different chains of transmission all of which in the end establish just one ḥadīth.’ (2005, 33).
The pious scholars of Islam in the Umayyad period; did they collude with the scholars of Madina in fabrication? And how did this happen? And where did the conference to enact this tactic take place? And if they did not collude with the scholars of Madina, why did they remain silent (about their supposed mass fabrication) and why did they take prophetic reports from them? (1998, 225).

5. 25. Matrūk – the Discarded.

The second type from the rejected [traditions] is by reason of the narrator being accused of lying, [which is called] matrūk.

Commentary

Ibn Ḥajar does not expand on the matrūk, and in fact Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ did not mention this type at all. However from other sources, we learn that a ḥadīth can be categorised as matrūk for two possible reasons. Firstly, a narrator narrates a tradition which no one else has mentioned, and the meaning of the text contradicts established, practiced laws.134 Secondly, a narrator lies in his everyday speech, though it has not been established as to whether he has lied in narrating prophetic reports.135

134 For example, ‘innocent till proven guilty.’
135 An example of such a ḥadīth is provided by Ṭahān, when he cites the case of ‘Amr ibn Shimar al-Ju’fī al-Kūfī al-Shīʿī, from Jābir, from Abū Ṭufâyil, from ‘Abd Allāh and ‘Ammār who said: ‘The Prophet ﷺ would perform qunūt at fajr Prayer, and he would perform takbīr on the day of ‘arafa after fajr, and stop at ‘āṣr on the last day of tashriq.’ Al-Nasāʾī, al-Dāraquṭnī and others have said that the ḥadīth of ‘Amr ibn Shimar al-Ju’fī is matrūk (Ṭahān 2001, 70).

The third is munkar according to the opinion of those who do not add the condition of opposition in munkar. And similarly, the fourth and the fifth [is also called munkar]. So whoever makes severe mistakes, or whose negligence is excessive, or his lewdness is apparent, then the ḥadīth is munkar.

The author previously defined munkar in the section on maʿrūf and munkar (section 5.12). It is where the report of a weak narrator is opposed by someone who is more reliable. The report which is accepted is then called maʿrūf.

Not everyone adheres to this definition of munkar. Here, Ibn Ḥajar cites the definition of munkar according to those who do not agree with the above definition. He writes that the third, fourth and fifth reason for rejection all have the same name – munkar. These reasons are severe mistakes by the reporter, negligence and open lewdness. Any of these three reasons results in classifying the report as munkar.

Perhaps munkar is the most ambiguously defined type of ḥadīth amongst the scholars. In essence, a ḥadīth labelled as munkar can be (i) because a weak narrator has opposed someone more authoritative (ii) because the reporter makes severe mistakes (iii) because the reporter is negligent (iv) or because the reporter is of lewd character. There is even a fifth definition from Ḥāfīz Abū Bakr Bardijī who defines munkar as ‘the ḥadīth whose matn is not known except from its [lone] reporter’ (Mīghālwi 2003, 431).\(^{136}\)

It is however possible to harmonise between these different views when one utilises the views of al-Imām Muslim as a backdrop. In the introduction to his Ṣaḥīḥ, he refers to munkar in detail and identifies how this type can be identified; when the reporter’s transmissions are compared with reliable reporters and it contradicts them (Juynboll 1996, III: 269). It is quite possible that the other views on what constitutes munkar – the severe mistakes, the reporter’s negligence and his lewd conduct – is directly as a result of his opposition of more reliable reporters. This contradiction is a clue that he did not take it from the sources he claims to have done so, or that he did not show the same precautions his contemporaries did.

Additionally, the section on munkar does indicate a reversal of what is otherwise a prevalent trend in the Nuzhah; the abundance of technical terms. Here we find that one term – munkar – is sufficient to cover an array of scenarios.

5. 27. Mu’allal- The Defective.

Then the doubt – and this is the sixth type; and it has been clarified by name because of the long explanation of it\(^{137}\) – if the doubt in it is known through the \(^{136}\) For example, al-Nasā‘ī and Ibn Māja have recorded from Abū Zukayr Yahyā ibn Muhammad ibn Qays, from Hishām ibn ‘Urwa, from his father, from ‘Ā‘ishah marfū‘an: ‘Eat unripe dates with ripe dates. For when man does so, the devil becomes angry.’ Al-Nasā‘ī remarked: ‘This ḥadīth is munkar. Abū Zukayr is alone in narrating this. He is a pious shaykh as [al-Imām] Muslim uses him in supporting narrations, but he has not reached the point where he can be trusted to narrate alone’ (Ṭāḥḥān 2001, 72).

\(^{137}\) Ibn Ḥajar did not elaborate on munkar and matrāk. In fact the original Nukhbah merely reads: ‘…and the second type is matrāk and the third is munkar according to an opinion. And so munkar is [also] the fourth and fifth.’ This is why at the beginning of this section on mu’allal, he writes that the reason for means of indicating factors, such as making the mursal or the munqaṭī continuous, or such as inserting a ḥadīth into another or harmful acts similar to these; and this is identified by intensive investigation and the gathering of the [numerous] chains, then this is [called] muʿallal. This is one of the deeply ambiguous types [to uncover] in ‘ilm al-ḥadīth and one of the most intrinsic. No one can aspire to [tackle it] except he whom Allāh Almighty has favoured with a penetrating understanding, a vast memory, a complete awareness of the different ranks of reporters and a strong grasp of chains and texts. For this reason, only a few have spoken on the issue from the people of this field, like ‘Alī ibn al-Madīnī, Al-Madīn, al-Bukhārī, Yaʿqūb ibn Abī Shayba, Ibn Abī Ḥātim, Abū Zurʿa and al-Dāraquṭnī. Sometimes the investigator of muʿallal falls short from establishing evidence for his claim [that a particular report is muʿallal], like a money exchanger in deeming counterfeit dirhams and dīnārs.

Commentary

As a technical term, muʿallal needs close analysis before we proceed to look at Ibn Ḥajar’s discussion on it. Muʿallal as a term does not appear in the works of al-Mayyānī’s (d. 581/1185) in his treatise on ‘ilm al-ḥadīth (Librande 1982). In al-Suyūṭī’s Tadrīb we are told who can tackle this field (‘the men of memorization, information and penetrating understanding’), what an ‘illa is literally (‘a hidden defamatory defect which looks sound apparently’), where it can appear (mostly in the isnād though sometimes in the matn) and the different forms it can assume, which is the elaborating on this type (and it has been clarified by name because of the long explanation of it) is due to its importance and thus the extra explanation required.
same as what is mentioned in the Nuzhah (1972, 1: pp. 251-3). Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ again informs us that it is a discipline reserved for the most competent scholars (1986, 89). He gives an example of how it can occur in the matn and isnād and how the term can be used in different ways (1986, pp. 90-1). Al-Irāqī’s Alfiyya refers to whether the correct term is muʿallal or maʿlūl, where it can occur (isnād and matn) and how it can be spotted (by intense investigation) (1995, pp. 100-103).

In all of these discussions, the detail is present but it is still difficult to pinpoint what exactly muʿallal is. It seems that the ḥadīth scholars have tried to give an objective portrayal of muʿallal though in reality it is anything but. Other terms pertain to a particular problem and scenario and can easily be differentiated from others. Mawdūʿ, matrūk, munkar, mursal and bidʿa are easy to define and their over-whelming feature can be explained. Mursal is a drop after the Successor. Munkar is the opposition of an authoritative. This is totally missing in muʿallal. It can occur in the matn and the isnād. It can come about because of issues related to the continuity of the isnād or because of a hidden defect in the narrator. In my opinion, it is a term coined for when the ḥadīth masters cannot objectively explain why it is rejected. It is an ‘ad hoc’ term used when it cannot categorised as mawdūʿ, matrūk, munkar, mursal, bidʿa and so on. When al-Bukhārī and the other experts declare a report as rejected (based on their intuition) and later scholars cannot objectively see how they reached that decision, then it is conveniently labelled muʿallal. This explains why the Nuzhah states that a muʿallal report does not need to be justified for its rejection, in the same manner a money exchanger does not need to give proof why he thinks the dirhams and dīnārs in front of him are counterfeit.
This point is important for two reasons. Firstly, mu'allal shows that the later ḥadīth scholars did not fully know the methodology of al-Bukhārī when it came to declaring reports sound or otherwise. If they did, then there would be no need for a type called mu'allal. Secondly, it indicates how important the technical terms were for the ḥadīth scholars. Even in the absence of technicality and objectivity and in the presence of intuition and ‘gut-feeling’, they still gave a technical feel to the discipline. It was a scientific term to an intuitive method and an attempt to define something vague. This shows how the technical terms in the field were used for different, covert purposes.

Proceeding to the Nuzhah on mu'allal, we see that Ibn Ḥajar offers only a glimpse into it. One of the reasons perhaps is because he defined it earlier in the text on the section on ṣahīḥ.\textsuperscript{138} There he wrote:

> And ‘mu'allal’ literally is that which contains a defect. And terminologically, it is that in which there is a hidden, defamatory, defect.

In this section, the text does inform us that;

i. This type of ḥadīth is based on the premises of doubt. For example, a reporter may try to pass a mursal or munqatī ḥadīth off as continuous when in fact it is clearly discontinuous.

ii. Finding such faults is extremely difficult. This is the reason why only a handful of scholars can claim proficiency in this type of ḥadīth, such as ‘Alī ibn al-Madinī.

iii. Even such experts sometimes fail to present evidence as to why a particular report is mu‘allal. Instead they intuitively justify their opinion, rather like an experienced money-exchanger who can pass a judgement on a currency note being fake, without objectively explaining why.

These two last points, it seems, relate to one another. A prominent theme that we have already observed throughout the Nuzhah is the appeal to respect authority and to accept the opinion of past, great ḥadīth masters. Here again, Ibn Ḥajar is highlighting this theme, but in a more intense manner. The Nuzhah is informing the reader that it is the task of the great ḥadīth masters like ‘Alī ibn al-Madīnī, Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal and al-Bukhārī to analyse mu‘allal. In fact, their authority is so great that they sometimes do not even need to empirically prove why a particular report is defective. Rather, like a money-exchanger who cannot objectively explain why he feels a currency is counterfeit, we do not require an explanation why the past ḥadīth masters have declared a report as mu‘allal; their decree is simply sufficient.

Again this section highlights the primacy of seniority in the discipline. It also questions whether the methods employed by the early ḥadīth were indeed empirical and scientific. Ibn Ḥajar is suggesting that sometimes, their mere opinion and intuition is sufficient as evidence for us.

5. 28. Mudraj– the Material Interpolated.

Then the opposition – and this is the seventh type – if it occurs by reason of the changing of the text or the changing of the isnād, then that alteration is mudraj al- isnād. And this is of many types. The first is that a group reports a ḥadīth with different chains. Then one from them reports it by gathering all into one chain from the numerous chains and then does not explain the variation. The second is that a narrator has the text except part of it. The remainder he has with a different isnād. He then reports the entire text using the first isnād. And from [this type too] is that the narrator hears a text from his shaykh and hears the rest of it indirectly. He then narrates it collectively with the omission of the indirect [reporter]. The third is that the reporter has two reports with two different chains. He then reports both of the reports using one of the chains only, or he narrates one of the reports with its own specific chain and adds in the second text that which is not found in the first.
The fourth is that the narrator reads an isnād and is then distracted, after which he says something himself. Some of the listeners think the [distracted] dialogue is the text for that chain and then narrates it [to others] as such. These are the types of mudraj al-isnād. As for mudraj al-matn, this is when dialogue occurs in the matn that does not belong to it. Sometimes it is at the beginning of the matn, sometimes in the middle and sometimes in the end, which is the most common because it occurs by joining a sentence to the next. Or [mudraj can be] by the merging of a mawqūf from the speech of the Companions or those after them into a marfūʿ from the speech of the Prophet  without clarification. This is then mudraj al-matn. The interpolated can be identified by the appearance of a detailed report highlighting the interpolated part, or [it can be identified] by the statement from the reporter or from some of the versed imāms, or [it can be identified] due to the impossibility that 139 Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ offers an example of this scenario:

‘An illustration of this is the ḥadīth of Ṣufyān ibn ‘Uyayna and Zāhida ibn Qudāma from ‘Āṣim ibn Kuwayb from his father from Wā’il ibn Ḥujr concerning the description of the prayer of the Messenger of God, at the end of which we find: ‘He came in the winter and saw them raising their hands under their cloaks.’ The correct version is the transmission of those who related from Šām ibn Kulaib under this chain the description of the prayer by itself and kept separate from it the reference to their raising their hands. They related the [second part] from Šām ibn Kuwayb from ‘Abd al-Jabbār ibn Wā’il from one of the members of his family from Wā’il ibn Ḥujr’ (1986, 98).
the Prophet could have said it. Al-Khaṭīb [al-Baghdādī] has compiled a book on mudraj, and I have summarised it and added to it twice or more than what he mentioned.⁴⁰ And for Allāh is praise.

Commentary

Ibn Ḥajar sees mudraj as important, which is reflected here by the fact he spends considerable effort in explaining its division (mudraj al-isnād and mudraj al-matn) and the forms it can assume. This is in addition to the fact that he alerts the reader of his work specifically on this topic, which he asks readers to consider.

It does not require substantial effort to deduce why the author sees mudraj as important, in particular mudraj al-matn. Ibn Ḥajar wants the reader to appreciate how crucial it was to keep the text of the ḥadīth pure from additional and alien input. If mechanisms are not found to root out mudraj, then it can lead to forgery or at the very least, confusion over what the Prophet said and what others (like the Companions reporting it) said in one report.

Additionally, Ibn Ḥajar here is implicitly adding weight to the ḥadīth authenticity debate. The existence of mudraj, and in particular mudraj al-matn, is a clear indication of the ḥadīth scholars’ expertise and awareness. They had the ability to study one text and deduce which part belonged to the Prophet’s words and which belonged to the Companions or other transmitters. If they could sift the prophetic words from the non-prophetic from one text, surely they could identify texts in which all of it did not stem from the Prophet, namely a forged report. So in essence, the complexity of the system laid down by the ḥadīth scholars was a means of refuting those who doubted it and the Nuzhah here reflects this sentiment. For Muslims, this is a running theme which brings comfort and reassurance. The dialogue of the Prophet was so extraordinary that others simply could not imitate his sayings. Al-Rabī‘ remarked that ‘the ḥadīth has a light as bright as daylight which helps to identify it…’ (in al-Ṣāliḥ 1999, 264).

5. 29. Maqlūb- the Mixed-up.

If the opposition is due to preceding and delaying, namely in the names like Murra ibn Ka‘b and Ka‘b ibn Murra, as the name of one of the two is the name of the father of the other, then this is maqlūb. For al-Khaṭīb [al-Baghdādī] is a book on this [called] Rāfi‘ al-irtiyāb. 141 The mixing sometimes occurs in the text too, like the ḥadīth of Abū Hurayra recorded by al-Imām Muslim, regarding the seven who Allāh will shade on the Day of Judgement beneath His throne which includes ‘a man that gives charitable donations discreetly to the extent that that the right hand does not know what the left hand has spent.’ This has been mixed up by one of the narrators; in reality it is ‘to the extent the left hand does not know what the right hand has spent’, as it is recorded in the two Ṣahīḥs.

Ibn Ḥajar explains maqlūb here, a ḥadīth where the existing text does not have any omission in the text or chain, but one part has been altered and swapped for the other.

141 Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī’s treatise on the subject is called Rāfi‘ al-irtiyāb fi-al-maqlūb min al-asmā‘ wa-al-ansāb (The Removal of doubt in the maqlūb from the names and ancestries).
As Ibn Ḥajar highlights, this alteration can occur both in the text or chain.

Maqlūb can take on various degrees of severity in terms of weakness, as mentioned below:

a. That a narrator swaps a narrator for someone else, with the intention of making the ḥadīth rare. An example is a ḥadīth from Sālim, which one narrator swapped for Nāfī‘ (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 291).

This has been the practice of forgers in the past, such as Ḥammād ibn ‘Amr al-Naṣibī, Ismā‘īl ibn Abī Ḥayya al-Yasa‘ and Buḥlūl ibn ‘Ubayd al-Kindī (al-Qārī 1994, 476). A person who performs this type of qalb is known to have ‘stolen the ḥadīth’ (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 291)

b. That a narrator swaps a narrator’s name with his father’s. For example, Ka‘b ibn Murra has been erroneously reported as Murra ibn Ka‘b.

c. That the narrator precedes and delays some words of the ḥadīth. In the text, Ibn Ḥajar gives the example where a reporter swapped the ‘right hand’ for the ‘left hand’.143

d. That the narrator takes the full chain of one ḥadīth and places it on another matn, with the intention of testing someone, like what famously happened to al-Imām al-Bukhārī when he first visited Baghdad.144

142 In one example, Ḥammād ibn ‘Amr al-Naṣibī narrated from al-A’mash, from Abū Ṣālīb, from Abū Hurayra: ‘When you meet the polytheists in the streets, do not greet them first.’ Ḥammād made this ḥadīth maqlūb. Though he said it was from al-A’mash, it was in fact from Suhayl ibn Abī Ṣālīb, from his father, from Abū Hurayra, as Muslim recorded it in his Ṣaḥīḥ.

143 Al-‘Uthaymin writes that frequently the swapping does corrupt the meaning of the ḥadīth and this report is one such example. The reason is because the Prophet encouraged his followers to perform righteous actions with their right hands. The maqlūb version of the report suggests giving charitable donations with the left is permissible (al-‘Uthaymin 2002, 218).
From these four forms, Ibn Ḥajar mentions the second and third form in the Nuzhah. He does not mention the swapping done for the sake of testing (d) and the alteration with the intention of making the ḥadīth rare (a).

This omission, however, is justified. He does not mention form (d) here because Ibn Ḥajar refers to this type as muḍʿarīb, which he explains later in the Nuzhah. Though it seems that this type should also be called maqlūb (as a form of swapping and mixing has occurred, which is what maqlūb means), scholars such as al-Khatibs al-Baghdādī (1996, 1: 207-8), Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ (1986, 101), al-ʾIrāqī (1995, 132), al-Suyūṭī (1972, 1: 292) and Ṭāḥhān (2001, 80) prefer to label this as a type of maqlūb. Al-Munāwī explains that this is also the opinion voiced by al-Nawawī (1999, 2: 90).

As for form (a), that a narrator swaps a narrator for someone else, with the intention of making the ḥadīth rare, Ibn Ḥajar does not mention it here in the Nuzhah because for him, this is now a mawḍūʿ ḥadīth, not maqlūb. Therefore, this short section on maqlūb does cover all the forms, though not necessarily all in this section.

This aside, maqlūb can be due to an innocent mistake. But it can also come about due to malicious intent. What this shows is that the forgers and fraudulent reporters had a vast 144 In al-Jāmiʿ li akhlāq al-rāwī wa ādāb al-sāmiʿ, al-Khaṭṭāb al-Baghdādī writes that in order to test the academic potency of the ḥadīth scholar, testing him by swapping the text and chain of reports is permissible. Perhaps one of the most famous tests was when al-ʿImām al-Bukhārī came to Baghdad. Ten ḥadīth scholars changed the iṣnāds and text of one hundred traditions and read them to al-Bukhārī. After hearing each scholar reading ten traditions each, he told them that he had no knowledge of the traditions. He then proceeded to correct each scholar and his narrations, so that the iṣnād and matn matched (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 101: al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 293). Al-Bukhārī faced a similar test in Samarqand and again he succeeded in highlighting his proficiency and outstanding intellect (Siddiqi 1993, 55). Al-ʾImām Muslim too was put through similar tribulations (Ibid.), as was al-ʿUqaylī (Ibn Ḥajar 1995, 82).

As for the permissibility of such a practice, it seems the scholars of ḥadīth do not encourage it. Al-Suyūṭī cites the opinion of al-ʾIrāqī who believes the swapping the ḥadīth’s chain and text for the sake of testing is a deviant practice, because in the swapped state, the report can no longer be considered a ‘ḥadīth’ (1972, 1: 294). Haram said in disgust to Shuʿba when he swapped the reports in order to test Abbān ibn Abī ‘Ayyāsh: ‘Most vile is that which you have done. Is this permissible?’ (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 294).
array of means at their disposal to tarnish the discipline. It also implicitly shows the frailty of attempting to understand fabricated traditions ḥadīth just by looking at mawdū‘. Ill-practice took on different forms (such as qalb, tadhīs and mu‘an’an) and only a holistic approach to the discipline can address the problem.

Or if the opposition is due to the addition of a narrator in the duration of the isnād – and the narrator who does not include the addition is more reliable – then this is mazīd fī muttaṣīl al-asānīd. Its condition is that clarification of hearing it [is found] in the place of addition. If not, then when it is mu‘an’an for example, the addition will be preferred.

Mazīd fī muttaṣīl al-asānīd is a rejected ḥadīth due to the addition of a narrator in the continuous isnād. This type will only be rejected when the words of delivery suggest clarification (such as ‘I heard’ rather than ‘an (from)) in the place where the addition is assumed. Also, the report must be compared with other ones to see whether the narrator who does not include the addition is more authoritative (al-Munāwī 1999, 2: 94). When these two conditions are met, then the ḥadīth is declared as an addition. Otherwise, if both or one of these conditions are not found, then the report with the addition will be accepted and the contrasting report will be deemed as a hidden drop (Anwar 2003, 461). No example is offered in the text of this type of ḥadīth from Ibn Ḥajar. Moreover, the author does not elaborate on why an extra reporter would appear in a chain.\(^{145}\)

5. 31. Muḍṭarib- The Disrupted.

Or if the opposition is with the changing of a narrator and there is no means of preferring one report over the other, then this is muḍṭarib. This usually occurs in the chain and sometimes occurs in the text. But rarely does a ḥadīth master declare a ḥadīth as muḍṭarib in relation to the text (matn) rather than the isnād. Sometimes the changing happens deliberately for whom is intended to be tested, like what happened to al-Bukhārī, ‘Uqaylī and others. The condition [for such a practice] is that the report should not remain [in that altered state]. Rather the practice should stop as the need for it ceases. If the alteration occurs intentionally and not for a certain purpose, like to make the report rare for example, then this is from the types of forgery. If it occurs due to a mistake, then it is from the maqlūb or muʿallal.

\(^{145}\) Ibn al-Ṣalāh cites that which Ibn al-Mubārak narrated who said Sufyān told us, from ‘Abd al-Raḥmān ibn Yazīd, from Busr ibn ‘Ubayd Allāh, from Abū Idrīs, from Wāthila from Abū Marthad, from the Prophet who said: ‘Do not sit on graves or pray towards them’ (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 286-7). Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ explains the addition in this example: ‘The mention of Sufyān in this chain is an addition and a mistake, just as the mention of Abū Idrīs is. The mistake of mentioning Sufyān was made by someone after Ibn al-Mubārak. This is because a number of reliable narrators related it from Ibn al-Mubārak directly from Ibn Jābir himself. Some of these narrators made explicit use of the phrase ‘He informed us’ (ikhbār) between them there. The mention of Abū Idrīs in the chain is a mistake attributable to Ibn al-Mubārak. This is because a number of reliable narrators related it from Ibn Jābir and they did not mention Abū Idrīs between Busr and Wāthila. Some of them explicitly mention there the audition of Busr from Wāthila’ (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 287).
Commentary

As mentioned earlier (5.29.), there is a difference amongst the scholars with regards to what exactly muḍṭarib is. Ibn Ḥajar writes here that muḍṭarib is where changing of some form has occurred and one report cannot be preferred over the other. Most scholars such as al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī (1996, 1: 207-8), Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ (1986, 101) and al-Suyūṭī (1972, 1: 292) are of the opinion that when the isnād and matn have been swapped, as in order to test someone, then this is labelled as maqlūb. Ibn Ḥajar believes that such a type is called muḍṭarib. Because they see the testing form as maqlūb, the other scholars entertain a different definition of muḍṭarib. For instance, al-Suyūṭī writes that muḍṭarib is a ḥadīth which is narrated in different contradicting ways, in a manner that one cannot be given preference over the other (1972, 1: 262).

Confusion over its exact definition is amplified further when we note that Ibn Ḥajar does not give an explicit definition or an example of such type of ḥadīth. This could possibly be the case because prior to the Nuzhah, he had completed the independent treatise on muḍṭarib, called al-Muqtarib fī bayān al-muḍṭarib. He felt that a prolonged discussion on this type was not therefore required in the Nuzhah. But this also points to some inconsistency on the author’s part. So far we have seen that when Ibn Ḥajar has an independent work on a particular ḥadīth type, then he alerts the reader of it in the relevant section. He did this with muʿallaq (section 5.18.) and mudraj (5.28). Here, despite a separate work on muḍṭarib, he does not mention it in the Nuzhah.

Previously in the section on muḥkam and mukhtalif al-ḥadīth (5.14. & 5.15.), the author was keen to stress that prophetic reports which contradict one another (in terms of the matn) hardly exist, and that the ḥadīth masters had tools at their disposal to harmonise seemingly contradictory reports. Once again, he makes the same point when he writes ‘rarely does a ḥadīth master declare a ḥadīth as muḍṭarīb in relation to the text (matn) rather than the isnād.’ He alerts the reader that deficiencies found in a ḥadīth normally relate to the isnād, not the matn.

An example of muḍṭarīb given by the Muslim scholars highlights this point amply.

Al-Tirmidhī narrated from Sharīk, from Abū Ḥamza, from Sha‘bī, from Fāṭima bint Qays, who said: ‘The Prophet ﷺ was asked about Zakāt and he said: ‘Indeed there is a right in wealth except Zakāt’. Ibn Māja narrates it through the same means with the words: ‘There is no right in wealth except Zakāt’. Al-‘Irāqī notes: ‘This ḥadīth is muḍṭarīb, and impossible to interpret’ (al-‘Irāqī 1995, 109).

Whereas al-‘Irāqī believes the matn is impossible to interpret, al-Suyūṭī writes that this ḥadīth as an example of muḍṭarīb is not correct, because harmonisation is possible and the text of the ḥadīth is possible to interpret so that both versions make sense. The affirmed ‘right’ in the wealth refers to the mustaḥabb, and the negated ‘right’ refers to the necessary (wājib). Moreover, because the shaykh of Sharīk is rejected and weak as a reporter, the contrasting report is given preference (al-Suyūṭī 1972, pp. 266-7).

What this example shows is that the ḥadīth masters exerted great effort in portraying contrasting texts from the Prophet as reconcilable. The explanation for this is the religious aspect of it. Accepting deficiencies in the matn suggests that the Prophet himself had erred, something which no Muslim ḥadīth master would want to acknowledge, even implicitly. Accepting deficiencies in the isnād on the other hand was tolerable, because now the blame is on the men reporting it, not the Prophet directly. This indicates why the ḥadīth scholars like Ibn Ḥajar preferred isnād-based investigations rather than matn-ones. The isnād-based investigations could unearth discrepancies and defects in the reporters at most. The matn-based investigations however could expose Prophet Muhammad as contradictory and inconsistent. The fact that ‛īlm al-ḥadīth has for long been accused of focussing on the isnād only and not the matn is well known. Importantly, this section indicates why this has been the case.

5.32. Muṣāḥḥaf & muḥarraf - the Misread and the Misspelling.

If the opposition is due to the changing of a letter or several letters though the form of the word remains the same; then if the changing is because of the dots [on the letter] then it is muṣāḥḥaf. If the changing is because of the form [of the word], then [it is] muḥarraf. Knowing this type is important. Indeed al-Imām al-‘Askārī 146, al-Dāraquṭnī and others have compiled books on this. It most often occurs in the text and sometimes occurs in the names [to be found] in the chains.

Commentary

In this relatively simple text, Ibn Ḥajar explains that two types of rejected reports can result due to the misspelling of a word;

146 The name of this book is Tashfīṭ al-muḥaddithūn. Other scholars to have written on this topic are al-Khaṭṭābī and Ibn Jawzī (al-Wajīdī 1996, 136).
(i) If there is a change in the dots (with the actual letter remaining the same), then this is called muşahhaf. For example, the name Shurayḥ (with the letter šīn) is erroneously read or written Surayḥ (with the letter sīn).

(ii) If the changes are because of a change in the actual letter then this is called Muḥarrraf. In other words, the word in question is mis-spelt due to the wrong letters. For example, Ḥafṣ is erroneously read Jaʿfar.

Ibn Ḥajar’s classification here differs from that of his predecessors:

a. Scholars such as Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ have classified the muşahhaf and muḥarrraf according to whether the mistake has occurred due to a reading error or an audible error (1986, 283).

b. Others choose to categorise it according to whether the mistake occurred in the chain or in the text.

c. A third possible division is according to whether the change has occurred in wording or in terms of meaning. In the latter case, it will be called muḥarrraf. The famous linguist Ibn Manẓūr writes that the word muḥarrraf derives from the root word tahrīf. This means ‘to change the meaning of the word’ (in Anwar 2003, 111).

As a guide to this section, it would have been useful to provide examples of mis-readings in the text or matn, as al-ʿIrāqī does (1995, pp. 332-3). Ibn Ḥajar does not do so. Had he had done so, then it would have given the reader an idea of how mistakes could occur, and more importantly, how it could sometimes distort the meaning of the report. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ gives an example where Zayd ibn Thābit reported that ‘the Messenger of Allāh was cupped (iḥtajama) in the mosque.’ Instead it should read, ‘He made an enclosure (iḥtajara) in the mosque’ (1986, 280).
5.32.1. Conclusion.

For many observers, the fact that the early Muslims preferred and favoured oral transmission over written records has been difficult to fathom. Aḥmad Amīn argued that precisely because prophetic reports were left to memory and were not recorded on paper, fabrication and corruption began very early, perhaps during the lifetime of the Prophet himself (Brown 1999, 89).

But this section does amplify the primacy of audible reports over written reports. This is because an error committed from audible reports is easier to rectify as one can refer to the original shaykh the report was taken from. The same cannot always be said for written reports. Moreover, Aḥmad Amīn fails to acknowledge the remarkable memory of the Arabs (Azami 1992, 20), as well as the fact that written records too have their pitfalls and disadvantages. Ibrāhīm al-Nakha’ī pointed out that ‘whoever writes becomes dependent on it’ (Azami 1977, 29). But perhaps most importantly, the early Arabs saw nothing wrong with dependence on oral transmission, like perhaps we do today. They simply never saw books as a necessary advantage. This is what Goldziher was referring to when he remarked: ‘[For the early Muslim] it was not desired to learn from books. Books are for practical use; he who wishes to gain the merit of seeking for the Prophet’s words must hunt these out from the mouth of the carriers’ (1971, 169). 147

147 More will be mentioned on oral transmission and its worth in section 5.55, 5.61 and 5.68.
5. 33. Ikhtiṣār al-ḥadīth and *riwāya bi-al-ma‘nā-

Shortening the ḥadīth and transmission by meaning.

It is not permissible to deliberately change the form of the matn at all, or shorten it with deletions, or by changing a word with an equivalent one, or by changing it to divert the meaning, except by a scholar aware of the indications of the words, according to the correct opinion in both issues [of shortening and transmission by meaning].

As for the shortening of the ḥadīth, the majority [of scholars] express its permissibility with the condition that the one shortening it is an expert. This is because the expert will not omit except that which has no link with the remaining text [and he will do it] in such a way that the indicated meaning will not differ and the explanation will not suffer from shortcomings, to the extent that the included and the excluded will be like two [independent] reports, or that which is included will [at least] indicate that which is excluded. This is as opposed to the ignorant, for he may omit that part which holds significance, like omitting the exception.

As for transmission by meaning, thus the difference [amongst the scholars] is well-known. Most are also of the opinion of its permissibility. Their strongest proof is the consensus on the permissibility of commentaries on sharī‘a [sources] done by non-Arabs undertaken by their experts. So when it is permissible to change it into another language, then changing it into Arabic is [certainly] allowed.

It is said that transmission by meaning is only permissible with solitary words and not sentences. It is also said that it is permissible for he who knows the original words so that he can revert to it. Additionally, it is said it is only permissible for he who had memorised the ḥadīth but then forgets it and the meaning still remains firm in his mind. Thus for him is the permissibility to narrate by meaning in order to explain a ruling, as opposed to someone who knows the ḥadīth by its wording. Everything here that has been mentioned concerns the permissibility and impermissibility of it. [However] there is no doubt that it is preferred that the ḥadīth is reported with its [exact] words without change. Al-Qāḍī ʿIyāḍ said: ‘It is desirable that the practice of transmission by meaning is stopped so that those who think that they are good at it but are not do not become prevalent, as it has happened with reporters in classic and modern times. And Allāh is the provider of guidance.

Ibn Ḥajar refers to two issues here; shortening the ḥadīth and transmission by meaning. It is important to note that both are not part of the discussion on the rejected traditions on the basis of defamation of the narrator. Rather it seems Ibn Ḥajar has included this section unsystematically, though it does seem to have some similarity with the previous section on muṣaḥḥaf and muḥarraf, since both involve alteration.

5. 33. 1 Ikhtisār al-ḥadīth – The shortening of the ḥadīth.

Narrators are expected to narrate the entire text of the ḥadīth, as they heard it from their source. However, circumstances can arise where the ḥadīth as a whole does not need to be mentioned. This could be because the reporter wants to highlight a certain ruling and needs to quote a ḥadīth for reference purposes. He may feel that this function can be served by only quoting part of the text. The shortening method has been employed by classical scholars; al-Bukhārī frequently mentioned only part of the ḥadīth as the sub-headings to his compilation.

However, allowing the practice in general could open the gate to the mass distortion of the ḥadīth. As Ibn Ḥajar highlights, an un-skilled reporter could leave out critical parts of the text which would then divert the listener from the ḥadīth’s true meaning.

Goldziher, it seems, has fallen to victim to this. In an attempt to show that al-Zuhri was willing to lend his name to politically support the Umayyad regime through mass fabrication, Goldziher writes that al-Zuhri himself had asserted that ‘these Emirs forced us to write ḥadīths’ (1971, 47). The full text of al-Zuhri’s statement exposes the true, intended meaning:

We did not originally approve of the written recording of religious knowledge until these Emirs obliged us to do so. Then we decided we should withhold it from none of the Muslims (cited in al-Sibāʿī 1998, pp. 248-9).

Not only does this quote show that the early Muslims preferred oral transmission and disliked the dependence on books alone, it also highlights the stark dangers in selectively picking one part of a quote, to the exclusion of the rest. Even Burton expresses dismay over Goldziher’s tactics:

This [statement from al-Zuhri] has nothing to do with the formation of a ministry of propaganda where, behind closed doors, officials engaged in concocting false ḥadīths to be disseminated among the public to further the regime’s public relations. The remark occupies its own place in the academic quarrel over the legitimacy or otherwise of preserving and transmitting the hadīth in writing (1994, 51).

This shows that sometimes the facts are there in front of us. What’s crucial is how one shapes and evaluates it.

So on this basis, the ḥadīth scholars dislike the practice of shortening the ḥadīth in general, but as Ibn Ḥajar points out, it has been permitted for the skilled scholars who are well-versed. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ voiced the same sentiments in his Muqaddima (1986, 216), as does al-Suyūṭī in Tadrib (1972, 2: 103).

5.33.1. Riwāya bi-al-ma‘nā – Transmission by meaning.

A constant theme that the Nuzhah has so far highlighted is the importance of the isnād. It would not be an exaggeration to say that the authenticity of a ḥadīth largely depended on the chain of transmission, epitomised by the fact that the conditions of a saḥīḥ report centre around the reporter. Little is said about the conditions pertaining to the matn. In this section, the matn comes to the forefront. After thirty-three sections, this is only the second time that the Nuzhah focuses entirely on the matn (the other was section 5.14/5 on mubkam and mukhtalif al-ḥadīth). The author clarifies the ruling on how to report the matn; does it have to reported in exactly the correct form the Prophet said the words, or can it be worded differently by the reporter?
Common sense dictates that during transmission, the reporter must use the exact words he himself gained the report. As most Muslims believe, the words of the Prophet are considered as revelation (wahy), attested by Allâh himself (al-Mahdî 1989, 23: Burton 1994, 17). Surely therefore, narrators are required to transmit the exact words of the Prophet as they heard them. Otherwise, they would be guilty of distorting the commands of Allâh.

Moreover, if each individual was permitted to use his own words when passing on the report, then undoubtedly the message and meaning would be affected. Allowing the practice of riwâya bi-al-maʾnâ would mean that by the time the report trickled down to al-Bukhârî, for example, it would not tally with what the Companions reported from the Prophet initially. Seen from this angle, one would expect a rigid ruling concerning riwâya bi-al-maʾnâ: that it should be outlawed to protect the matn. Instead, we find that Ibn Ḥajar here is torn between ideal and reality.

Ibn Ḥajar does show he is aware of the dangers relating to the practice. In the Nuzhah, the opinion of al-Qâḍî ʿIyâḍ (d. 544/1139) is cited, who comments that it is preferable to prevent non-literal narration altogether. Otherwise, granting Muslims the free hand to relate the words of the Prophet would lead to a mass distortion of his message. Therefore the author does suggest that ideally, it should not be permitted.

But Ibn Ḥajar’s analysis here deals more with the reality: that riwâya bi-al-maʾnâ did flourish in the early period of Islam. For example, al-Zuhrî (d. 124/742) said: ‘When you have expressed the meaning [of the ḥadîth], then there is no objection’ (al-Khatîb al-Baghdâdî 1996, 2: 22). Sufyân al-Thawrî (d. 161/777) said: ‘Were we required to narrate traditions of the Prophet exactly as we heard it, we would not transmit a [single] saying of his’ (al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī 1996, 2: 23). Ibn Sīrīn was reported to have said: ‘I used to collect traditions from ten [narrators]; the meaning was one but the wording differed’ (al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī 1988, 206). These three quotes show that during the earliest period of ḥadīth collection and transmission, riwāya bi-al-ma’nā was rampant.

The practice of it meant its justification too was required. Again, early scholars suggested why riwāya bi-al-ma’nā was acceptable. One supporting evidence cited by al-Suyūṭī is ascribed to al-Īmām al-Shāfī’ī. He argues that the Qur’an was revealed in seven qirā’as, and the Prophet gave permission to the Muslims to choose whichever recitation they found the easiest. The seven qirā’as differ slightly in wording. So, if permission is granted with the Qur’an, then naturally it should be permissible in the ḥadīth of the Prophet (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 99). Ibn Ḥajar in the Nuzhah suggests that it is theoretically impossible to deny the legitimacy of riwāya bi-al-ma’nā. If translating religious texts in other languages is perfectly legitimate – by consensual agreement – then it must be permissible to change the words of the Prophet into the Arabic language.

In fact, Muslims went to extremes to justify the practice. Take, for instance, the following example cited by al-Suyūṭī in his ḥadīth manual Tadrīb al-rāwī. As proof for riwāya bi-al-ma’nā’s permissibility, he cites the incident of ‘Abd Allāh ibn Sulaymān, who once said to the Prophet:

‘O Prophet of Allah! I hear your sayings but I am not able to transmit it to others in exactly the same form as you said it; a letter is added or omitted’. The Prophet replied: ‘So long as you do not make forbidden things legal, or legal things forbidden, and you express the meaning, then there is nothing wrong’ (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 99).

This report is not sufficient to prove the legitimacy of riwāya bi-al-ma’nā. Firstly, we do not know as to whether the Prophet was making ‘Abd Allāh ibn Sulaymān the exception to the rule, owing to his unique circumstances. Secondly, al-Sakhāwī classifies this very narration as mudtarrīb, which is rejected (Ibn a-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 94). In fact, some scholars have also suggested that the narration is fabricated (Latīf in al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 99). Even if it is not fabricated, it is still interesting that al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī – a strong, early advocate of transmission by meaning – did not mention the same narration in al-Jāmi‘.

Put simply, it is an indication of how fabrication was used for religious purposes, something which non-Muslim academics like Goldziher have for long suggested. The result of this conflict between ideal and reality is that the Nuzhah lacks conviction on riwāya bi-al-ma’nā. The section falls short of offering a rigid verdict on its ruling and instead cites different opinions on the matter. Perhaps this is a reflection of how the Muslim scholars have approached the issue with indecision and uncertainty. On the one hand, al-Suyūṭī writes that traditions relating to a specific occurrence have passed down to us, but the wording from the various Companions who heard it differs slightly. This, therefore, indicates that to narrate according to the meaning was common practice amongst the Companions (1972, 2: 99). Yet on the other hand, there is ample evidence to suggest that the Companions would narrate a ḥadīth of the Prophet, in exactly the form they heard it, but would still take precaution by reminding the auditors that this was according to how they heard it. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī writes that ‘Abd Allāh would narrate a saying from the Prophet, and then say ‘or like that’, or ‘to that effect’ or ‘similar to that’. Even then, he would tremble in fear (1996, 2: 26). Anas ibn Mālik too would tremble after narrating the words of the Prophet (1996, 2: 28). What this tells us is that they would go to extreme lengths to transmit the words of the Prophet in exactly the same form they heard it themselves. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī adds: ‘…They [the Companions] would only add these words at the end to prevent distortion, as they knew the possible dangers of narrating by meaning. And Allāh knows best’ (1996, 2: 25-6).

5.33.2. Conclusion.

With such a vast array of opinions on whether one can report traditions by meaning, clarity on the issue is essential. Daniel Brown quotes several Muslim modern scholars who advocate that riwāya bi-al-maʿnā led to an influx of unsound traditions in ḥadīth literature. For instance, Aḥmad Khan believes this practice is a serious flaw in the process of transmission (cited in 1999, 88). Jayrājpurī (1881-1955) writes that:

Since the Companions had not written ḥadīth down when they were with the Prophet, nor consciously memorised his words, the best that they could do was to transmit what they remembered. As a result, the muḥaddithūn had no choice but to accept such transmissions (cited in Brown 1999, 89).

Ibn Ḥajār does at least attempt to offer that clarity. He states in the Nuzhah that the whole discussion revolves around the permissibility of riwāya bi-al-maʿnā. All scholars agree that ideally, the practice of riwāya bi-al-lafz is preferred. Hence, most scholars see riwāya bi-al-ma’nā as an option and not a norm.

Secondly, the Nuzhah tries to offer clarity by allowing the practice, but with strict conditions. Here, Ibn Ḥajar depends on the writings of al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī who suggests that practice of riwāya bi-al-ma’nā is permissible, but with strict conditions. These conditions are:

i. That the narrator is well-versed with meanings of the word (al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī 1996, 2: 25-6).

ii. He has ample insight into the topic of the narration (Ibid.).

iii. He has a firm understanding of Arabic in all of its variations and dialects (Ibid.).

iv. That the text being transmitted must be clear and known. If the meaning of the ḥadīth is hidden, ambiguous and open to interpretation, then it is not permissible to narrate by meaning (Ibid.).

v. That the narrator is permitted to change individual words but not whole sentences

vi. It is said that it is only permissible for he who can recall the exact words so that he can use them if needed (Ibid.)

vii. It is also said that it is permissible for he who remembers the ḥadīth, forgot the words, but still remembers the meaning well (Ibid.)

viii. Some scholars have allowed the practice when the saying refers to someone other than the Prophet (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 99).

In my opinion, the issue is much clearer than Ibn Ḥajar has depicted and indeed many other ḥadīth scholars. Quite simply, we must venture into the precise type of ḥadīth which is subject to this practice. This is instrumental in determining the permissibility and non-permissibility of riwāya bi-al-maʾnā. Numerous scholars – classical and contemporary – have divided the traditions according to nature of whether it is a saying, action or affirmation of the Prophet. Al-Mahdī writes:

> The sunna of the Prophet (peace be upon him) encompasses his sayings, actions, affirmations and descriptions of his physical and moral characteristics (1989, 11).

When the Companions reported the actions, affirmations and characteristics of the Prophet, they used their own words, which is why narrations relating to the same theme differed in wording. However, when the Companions reported the actual sayings of the Prophet, they took utmost care to narrate the transmission exactly as they heard it from the Prophet. This also explains why many Companions would tremble as they related the words of the Prophet; it was an expression of how important they deemed it to report his words exactly as he said them. This also explains why many experts expressed leniency in allowing individuals to transmit narrations using their own words; it specifically referred to non-verbal traditions of the Prophet.

To prove this thesis, consider the following example. The Prophet said:

> If Allah wishes good for a person, then He grants him the understanding of religion.\(^\text{148}\)

This is a verbal ḥadīth of the Prophet (al-ḥadīth al-qawīlī). Al-Bukhārī 149, Muslim 150, al-Tirmidhī 151, Ibn Māja 152, al-Dārimī 153, Aḥmad 154 and Mālik 155 have all reported this tradition. The wording of each narration is identical, with no addition or omission. All narrations express exactly the same meaning with exactly the same words. This is because it was a saying of the Prophet (rather than his action) which therefore led to the reporters expressing more accuracy in how they reported it.

Even in prophetic reports that are not considered his sayings but a description of his actions, the reporters still showed a considerable amount of uniformity. Take the example of the ‘method of revelation’ tradition, which describes how divine revelation would descend upon the Prophet. Al-Imām al-Bukhārī records the following ḥadīth as the second entry in his Šahīḥ:

Narrated ‘Āʾisha, that al-Ḥārith ibn Hishām asked Allāh's Apostle: ‘O Allah's Apostle! How is the Divine Inspiration revealed to you?’ Allah's Apostle replied:

‘Sometimes it is (revealed) like the ringing of a bell, this form of Inspiration is the most difficult of all and then this state passes off after I have grasped what is inspired. Sometimes the Angel comes in the form of a man and talks to me and I grasp whatever he says.’ ‘Ā’isha added: ‘Verily I saw the Prophet being inspired divinely on a very cold day and noticed the sweat dropping from his forehead [as the Inspiration was over].

This same ḥadīth has been recorded by several scholars of ḥadīth, including Muslim, al-Tirmidhī, al-Nasāʾī, Al-Hamd and Mālik. The wording and sequence in each of these compilations slightly differ, but each ḥadīth in all of these sources;

i. Compare the revelation to the ‘ringing of a bell’. In fact all narrations describe this phenomenon with exactly the same words (salsala al-jaras)

ii. Mention that this form of revelation is the hardest for the Prophet to endure (wa huwa ashaddu ‘alayya).

iii. Use the same verb (wa ‘ā) to describe how the Prophet would ‘grasp’ the revelation that had come to him.

These approach of mine can help mute the large barrage of criticism riwāya bi-al-maʾnā leads to. Some observers have suggested that riwāya bi-al-maʾnā was an ideal opportunity for fabricators to inundate ḥadīth literature with forged traditions. In theory at least, such suggestions seem to have some basis. The formal and universal writing of prophetic traditions also would have ensured that riwāya bi-al-maʾnā would not have to exist at all.

To conclude, the section serves as a reminder that knowledge is not the prerogative of Muslims exclusively or non-Muslims exclusively. They both possess it and they both have an equal right to earn it and indeed share it. Ibn Ḥajar warns against the practice of the shortening a report that leads to its distortion and Goldziher did exactly that. Goldziher warned that the early period of ḥadīth collection was marked by forgery for religious purposes and the report of ʿAbd Allāh ibn Sulaymān suggests exactly that.

5.34. Sharḥ al-gharīb- the Commentary of the Rare Words.

Thus if the meaning is unclear – that the word is used rarely – then the compiled books in the commentary of rare words are required, like Abū ʿUbayd al-Qāsim ibn Sallām’s work; and this is unarranged. Shaykh Muwaffaq al-Dīn ibn Qudāma arranged the book in order of letters. The most comprehensive book is the book of Abū ʿUbayd al-Harawī. Al-Ḥāfiẓ Abū Mūsā al-Madīnī edited this work and made improvements to it. And by al-Zamkhasharī is a book called al-Fāʾiq [which is] arranged well. Then Ibn al-Athīr gathered all in al-Nihāya; this is the easiest book to use as a reference, with only a few places where additional help is required. If a particular word is used often, but [in the ḥadīth] it is used in a specific context, then compiled works like Sharḥ maʿānī al-akbār (commentaries on the meanings of the report) and Bayān al-mushkil (explanation of the difficult) are needed. Many scholars have written books in this field, like al-Ṭaḥāwī, al-Khāṭṭābī, Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr and others.
Commentary

This section certainly amplifies the opinion that Ibn Ḥajar’s Nuzhah was aimed at students embarking on ḥadīth studies for the first time. It explains which types of works one can refer to find the explanation of rare words found in the text of prophetic reports, and some of the scholars who have authored such works.¹⁵⁶

One may reach the conclusion that the existence of reference books called Sharḥ al-gharīb suggests that the prophetic reports are generally difficult to understand and fathom. The Muslim scholars reply that to a large extent, this is not the case. Firstly, the Prophet himself ensured that his words were not to subject to misunderstanding and would often repeat a sentence thrice (Azami 1977, 9). Secondly, it was the rapid expansion of Islam to non-Arab lands that really led to the need of such supporting literature, in the third generation of Muslims (Kamali 2005, 123). This is reflected by the fact that the first works on reference books called Sharḥ al-gharīb appeared in the first part of the second Islamic century.

(i) Abū ‘Ubayd al-Qāsim’s (d. 224/838) book, though this was not arranged in order. It took him forty years to compile this book (Mighālwi 2003, 582). Later, Shaykh Muwaffaq al-Dīn ibn Qudāma (d. 620/1223) arranged the book in order. (ii) Abū ‘Ubayd al-Harawi’s (d. 401/1010) book, which is more comprehensive than the above. Al-Ḥāfiz Abū Mūsā al-Madīnī (d. 581/1185) edited this work and made improvements to it. (iii) Al-Zamkhahārī’s (d. 538/1143) book called al-Fā‘iq, which Ibn Ḥajar praises for its good, systematic order. (iv) Ibn al-Athīr (d. 606/1209) then gathered all previous works in the field into one book, called al-Nihāya. Later, al-Suyūṭī summarised this work and improved on it in al-Durr al-nathīr fi talkhīs nihāyat Ibn al-Athīr.

Then the unknown [state] of the reporter – this is the eighth reason for defamation – can appear for two reasons. One of them is that the narrator has numerous [means of] references, like [his] name, lineage, title, occupation, description or ancestry. He becomes known by one of them, only then to be mentioned with a name he is not known with, for one reason or another. So it is thus assumed it is someone else [when in fact it is the same person]. Hence, his state becomes unknown. The scholars have written in this discipline al-Muwaddi̇h li-awhām wa-al-tafri̇q; al-Khaṭīb [al-Baghdādī] has done excellently in it. He was preceded by ‘Abd al-Ghānī, then al-Ṣawrī\(^\text{157}\). An example [of an unknown narrator] is Muḥammad ibn al-Sā‘īb ibn Bishr al-Kalbī. Some have ascribed his name to his grandfather and have said ‘Muḥammad ibn Bishr’. Others have named him Ḥammād ibn al-Sā‘īb. Some have ascribed him to his son [by calling him] Abū al-Naḍr and Abū Sa‘īd and Abū Hishām\(^\text{158}\). It became [to the point] where it was assumed these were a group of reporters, though it is one. He who is not aware of the reality of the matter will be oblivious of this.

The other [reason] is that the reporter sometimes only narrates rarely and thus reports are not taken from him often.\(^\text{159}\) The scholars have written [compilations called] waḥdān; namely those reporters from whom only one narrate, even if he is named. From [the scholars] who have compiled [in this area] are Muslim, al-Ḥasan ibn Sufyān\textsuperscript{160} and others.

\(^{158}\) Al-Munāwī adds that he has also been referred to as ‘Ātya al-‘Awfī (1999, 2: 132).

\(^{159}\) Abū al-Ashrār al-Dārimī, for example, rarely reported narrations and only Ḥammād ibn Salāma was known to report from him (Ṭaḥḥān 2001, 89: Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 322). Wahb ibn Khanbash al-Ṭā‘ī, ‘Āmir ibn Shahr, ‘Urwa ibn Muḍarrīs, Muḥammad ibn Ṣafwān, Muḥammad ibn Ṣayfī are all examples of Companions from whom only Sha‘bī reported from (al-Munāwī 1999, 135). Muḥammad ibn Abī Ṣafwān al-Thaqāfī from the Successors only reported to Thawrī (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 322).

Ibn Ḥajar returns to the division of reports based on defamation in the reporters. \textit{Jahāla} is where the ḥadīth is rejected because of surrounding confusion regarding who the reporter actually is. The author indicates two reasons why this ignorance may come about, too many names and lack of ḥadīth reporting.

Ibn Ḥajar’s short account of \textit{jahāla} avoids the controversy surrounding the area. The impression given by his writings is that the obscurity of the reporter is of no or little fault of himself. Rather, he is a victim of the mistake of others.

What is clear however from other scholars is that the practice of naming a reporter with an unclear name is sometimes done with ill intent. This is called \textit{tadlīs al-shuyūkh} (see section 5.21.1). Forgers too can indulge in this practice to avoid detection. Muḥammad ibn Qays al-Shāmī had fifty different aliases, and as al-Munāwī writes, possibly one hundred (al-Munāwī 1999, 2: 133).

Perhaps because the ill-intent now causes it to be classified as a separate type of ḥadīth such as \textit{mawdū‘} and \textit{tadlīs}, Ibn Ḥajar chose not to expand on the cases where \textit{jahāla} takes on a more contentious form.

5.36. Mubham – The Obscure.

Or the [ambiguity of the reporter can occur] because the reporter is not named from the one he is reporting from due to short hand, like ‘such and such informed me’ or ‘the shaykh informed me’ or ‘the man informed me’ or ‘the son of such and such informed me’ and its likes. Identifying the obscure [person’s] name is achieved by his mentioning in another isnād with his name. The scholars have written mubhamāt in this field. The ḥadīth of the obscure is not accepted until he is named, because the condition of acceptance is the credibility of the reporter. When a person whose name is obscure cannot be identified, how will his credibility be known? And similarly, the report will not be accepted when his name is obscured with a credible title, like ‘the authoritative informed me’. This is because he may be credible according to him but not to others. This is the most correct opinion in the matter. Because of this point, the mursal is not accepted, even if a reliable person does the irsāl with certainty. It is said that the ḥadīth will be accepted, in adherence to the apparent state, since defamation (jarḥ) is not the default state. It is [also] said that it is accepted if the one doing it is a [reputed] scholar or someone who shares the same school of thought. This is not part of the discussions on ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. And Allāh provides religious guidance.

If the reporter names the source, and one reporter is solitary in reporting from him, then this is majhūl al-‘ayn. This is like mubham [in that it is rejected] unless someone other than him verifies him, according to the most sound opinion. Likewise, it will be accepted if the sole person reporting from him is an authority.
If two or more report from him but he is not verified as credible, then this is majhūl al-ḥāl, [also called] mastūr. A group of scholars have accepted such a narration without condition, though the majority has rejected this [stance]. The detail is that the narration of a mastūr and its likes in which there is possibility will neither be unequivocally accepted or rejected. Rather it is paused upon until its state is clarified, as Imam al-Ḥaramayn has asserted and Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ regarding someone who defames someone without a detailed reason.

Three different types of rejected reports are identified here by Ibn Ḥajar; mubham, majhūl al-ʿayn and majhūl al-ḥāl. Mubham is where the narrator is not clarified in the ḥadīth. Majhūl al-ʿayn is where the narrator’s name is mentioned, but only one person narrates from him. Examples are such reporters include ‘Amr Dhū Murr, Jabbār al-Ṭāʾī and Saʿīd ibn Dhū Ḥuddān: only Abū Isḥāq al-Sabīʿī has reported from these men (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 113). Majhūl al-ḥāl (also called mastūr) is where two or more narrate from an individual, but he is yet to be authenticated. Three crucial points are worthy of closer inspection in this particular section in the Nuzhah.

a. The rulings related to these three types of report do suggest the rigidity employed by the ḥadīth masters. This is certainly shown with majhūl al-ḥāl. Two people are known to report from him, yet the majority say the report is still rejected, or at least paused upon.

b. As it has already been shown in the Nuzhah, this section reflects the role seniority plays in the discipline. Majhūl al-ʿayn is rejected, unless, Ibn Ḥajar writes, ‘the sole person reporting from him is an authority.’ Once an individual reaches a certain status and ability, then he becomes protected and enjoys a different set of rules to others. In particular, the ‘authorities’ being protected with the ruling of majhūl al-‘ayn are al-Bukhārī and Muslim. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ notes that al-Imām al-Bukhārī has included the reports of those from whom only one has narrated in his Ṣahīḥ: only Qays ibn Abī Ḥāzim has reported from Mirdās al-Aslamī. The same can be said of Muslim in his Ṣahīḥ: only Abū Salma ibn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān has reported from Rabī‘a ibn Ka‘b al-Aslamī (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 113). This suggests that the rule of rejection is not universal but particular to individual cases and circumstances, based on seniority. As with the ruling on mu‘allaq, everyone is expected to adhere to one rule and the likes of al-Bukhārī and Muslim enjoy another.

c. Thirdly, Ibn Ḥajar’s analysis refers to cases where the name of the reporter is not clarified in the ḥadīth. The section does not go beyond this and no real explanation is offered as to why such circumstances arise. Nor is he the only Muslim scholar to offer such an objective approach to the obscurities in names: the same can be said of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ and of al-Munāwī.

The answer to the question – to some extent – is politics. Due to political unrest and fear of persecution, some ḥadīth reporters were sometimes fearful of mentioning their source (al-‘Uthaymin 2002, 236).

5.36.1. Conclusion.

To conclude, an appreciation of the discipline in light of the political and social climate of the time would help us understand ‘ilm al-ḥadīth better. The loss of such an approach is undoubtedly shown in this section on the obscurities, where, as it has been suggested, the political climate can have ramifications on the method of ḥadīth transmission.
One can appreciate why the Nuzhah did not expand on such crucial issues. It was meant to be an introduction to ‘ilm al-hadīth, not to historical studies. If Ibn Ḥajar’s approach was so narrowly focussed on ‘ilm al-hadīth – remember that he hardly ever entertains discussions related to fiqh in the Nuzhah – there was clearly no need to discuss why reporters often hid their sources due to political reasons.

The target audience is perhaps another factor. As an introduction to the discipline for students embarking on the studies for the first time, discussions on politics would perhaps cause unease and alarm for the reader. Ibn Ḥajar’s Nuzhah was there to express the perfection and rigidity of the field, not to explore the darker side of it.

But importantly, did Ibn Ḥajar at least acknowledge the effects of politics on ḥadīth transmission? In his works, he hardly did. The only place where politics gets a mention in the Nuzhah is where the author acknowledges that forgery was done ‘in pursuit of pleasing some leaders.’

This, in many ways, was typical of most Muslim scholars. They were eager to paint a dividing line between religion and politics and to play down the importance of politics in ḥadīth transmission. A divorce from political life was the norm for the ḥadīth masters, according to Siddiqi and his likes. Siddiqi points out that none of the Companions known for ḥadīth transmission participated in the civil unrests that erupted after the Prophet passed away. He adds that:

Abū Dharr, Muḥammad ibn Maslama, Sa‘īd ibn al-Musayyab, Abū al-ʿĀliya, al-Muṭarrif, al-Ḥasan ibn Yasār, Masrūq and many other Companions and Successors kept entirely out of politics. Some preferred prison and torture to lending support to any of the warring factions against their own conviction. Sa‘īd ibn al-Musayyab, for instance, was flogged by Ibn al-Zubayr… al-Imām Mālik was whipped on the orders of al-Manṣūr, because some of his legal judgements did not suit the Caliph (1993, 39).

Similarly according to Azami, the discipline of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth as a whole worked independently from the field of politics. He cites the example of Ibn Ḥanbal and his clash with the creeds of the Caliph and Mu‘tazila sect. He asked the Caliph to bring forward a single ḥadīth of the Prophet that supported the official view. But the Caliph was unable to do so. Azami purports that if fabrication was so widespread, and – in the opinion of Schacht (1959, 164) – prophetic reports were produced and forged on demand to prove a particular religious point – then certainly the Caliph would not have struggled to prove Ibn Ḥanbal wrong by producing evidence (Azami 1996, 2).

However, the reality is somewhat different. There were cases where politics did mix with religion. Ever since the Prophet passed away, politics has always been a source of dispute and indeed bloodshed for the Muslims. The restriction of political power to Quraysh, the hints of nepotism from ‘Uthmān and his violent death, the Companions fighting one another in the ‘Battle of the Camel’, the stand-off between Mu‘āwiya and ‘Alī and the tragedy of Karbalā - who can confidently claim that these political and violent clashes did not affect the theological affairs of Muslims? Al-Sibā‘i wishes to dismiss the relationship between ḥadīth and politics, but also admits that the political tension between Mu‘āwiya and ‘Alī was the starting point for forgery in ḥadīth (1993, 93). ‘Awāna ibn al-Ḥakam was known to forge prophetic reports in favour of the Umayyads, whereas other traditionists – though not necessarily forgers – did enjoy limited patronage from the state, such as ‘Urwa ibn al-Zubayr, Rajā’ ibn Ḥayawayh and Muḥammad ibn Muslim al-Zuhrī (Siddiqi 1993, 90).

These examples are the ones which Muslim scholars will admit to. Then there are the cases highlighted by non-Muslim scholars like Goldziher, which highlight the close interaction between politics and the transmission of ḥadīth. He suggested that the Umayyad regime used ḥadīth as a vehicle to strengthen and consolidate their grasp on power. The fact the some reporters were unwilling to name their sources suggests that Goldziher may have had some basis to his research. He famously suggested that al-Zuhrī forged the report encouraging Muslims to visit the Furthest Mosque in Jerusalem in order to help ‘Abd al-Malik against his political opponent ‘Abd Allāh ibn al-Zubayr (1971, II: 44-5). In fact, Goldziher suggested that ḥadīth literature told us very little about the

Goldziher wrote:
‘When the Umayyad caliph ‘Abd al-Malik wished to stop the pilgrimages to Mecca because he was worried lest his rival ‘Abd Allāh b. Zubayr should force the Syrians journeying to the holy places in Hijaz to pay him homage, he found recourse to the expedient of the doctrine of the vicarious hajj of Qubbat al-Ṣakhra in Jerusalem. He decreed that the obligatory circumambulation could take place at the sacred place in Jerusalem with the same validity as that around the Ka‘ba ordained in Islamic Law. The pious theologian al-Zuhrī was given the task of justifying the politically motivated reform of religious life by making up and spreading a saying back to the Prophet, according to which there are three mosques to which people may make pilgrimage; those in Mecca, Medina and Jerusalem. This ḥadīth shows its sharp tendentiousness in an addition which, apparently, belonged to its original form but was later neglected by leveling orthodoxy in this and related sayings ‘and a prayer in the Bayt al-Maqdis of Jerusalem is better than a thousand prayers in other holy places’ i.e. even Mecca and Medina’ (1971, pp. 44-45).

Guillaume made a similar claim in his works too (1924, pp. 47-48).

In reply, the Muslims have tried to mute the seriousness of this claim. Al-Sibā’i makes several important remarks regarding Goldziher’s observations. Firstly, ‘Abd al-Malik did not build the Dome of the Rock; his son al-Walīd did, according to historians such as Ibn ‘Asākir, al-Ṭabarānī, Ibn al-Athīr, Ibn Khaldūn and Ibn Kathīr. Secondly, the supposed forged ḥadīth extolling the virtue of travelling to Jerusalem could not have been forged by al-Zuhrī. This is because identical reports have been recorded in the six canonical collection, with chains of transmission featuring reporters other than al-Zuhrī. Thirdly, if the ḥadīth was supposedly forged by al-Zuhrī to encourage people to perform the Pilgrimage at Jerusalem, the maṭn of the report hardly suited and assisted this objective. The report only mentions how the mosque should be visited and how prayers should be held in it. If, as Goldziher suggests, the place was meant to be a rival to Makka Prophet, and more about the Muslims wrestling with their political and social circumstances in the first and second century.

So despite reassurances from the Muslim academics, it is difficult to dismiss the importance politics played in early ḥadīth transmission. Like many treatises on ‘ilm al-ḥadīth, such controversies are avoided by Ibn Ḥajar in the Nuzhah, in favour of an objective portrayal of the discipline. We are told of the great rank of pious traditionists such as al-Bukhārī, Muslim, Aḥmad ibn Hanbal and Mālik ibn Anas, but there are no clues why they all faced political trouble or even persecution by their respective state leaders. Such accounts are left to the history compilations rather than the ḥadīth books.

Then the innovation – and this is the ninth reason for defamation in the narrator – either it necessitates disbelief, in that he believes in something which results in disbelief, or the innovation necessitates fisq (deviance). Thus the majority do not accept the first, though it is said that it is accepted unequivocally and it is [also] said that it is accepted if the person does not believe in the permissibility of lying to assist his opinion. The reality is that every report of the mubtadi‘ that leads to disbelief will not be rejected. This is because every sect claims that the opposing party is heretical and sometimes they exaggerate the claim by declaring them disbelievers. If this opinion was to be accepted generally, then it would necessitate that all sects are disbelievers. Hence the trusted opinion is that the narration of someone who denies for ḥajj, why was there no mention of when the mosque should be visited, namely in the season of the Pilgrimage? (al-Sibā‘ī 1998, 243-7) the multiply-attested (mutawātir) matters of shar‘īa, known in religion through conviction will be rejected. And similar is the case for one who does the opposite (in that he believes in something which is definitively known to be forbidden in shar‘īa).

As for someone who is not of this attribute, coupled with the fact that he is careful in what he reports with awareness and piety, then there is no hindrance to accepting his report.

In the second – namely the one whose innovative beliefs do not lead to disbelief – there lies a dispute too in accepting and rejecting it. Thus it is said that it is unequivocally rejected. This opinion is far-fetched. The most common reason given for its rejection is that narrating from him will be promoting his belief and will be an approval of it. If this is the case, then the report of a mubtadi‘ in which a non-mubtadi‘ also features should also be rejected. It is also said that the report of the agent is accepted in general, except if he believes in the permissibility of lying, like what has already been mentioned. It is also said the mubtadi‘’s report is accepted if he does not propagate his bid‘a. This is because appeal to his innovation may result in distorting the narrations [in his favour] and moulding it to comply with the requirements of his innovation. This is the most correct opinion. Ibn Ḥiibbān has deviated by claiming the consensus on accepting the agent’s report without further investigation, when he does not propagate it. Yes, most are of the opinion of accepting such a report, but if he reports that which strengthens his innovation, then it is rejected according to the preferred, majority opinion. This is what al-Ḥāfiẓ Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ya‘qūb al-Jurjānī, the shaykh of Abū Dāwūd has clarified, as well as al-Nasā’ī in his book Ma‘rifat al-‘ilal. In this he said when describing the different grades of a narrator, of which one of these is ‘turning away from the truth’ (zā’igh ‘an al-ḥaqq):

If such a person speaks the truth and his ḥadīth is not munkar, even if he is a mubtadi‘, then there is nothing to stop us from accepting his narration as long as he does not promote his innovative beliefs openly.

This opinion is strong because the reason why we reject a sectarian’s ḥadīth is when the text of the ḥadīth apparently promotes his own innovative beliefs, even if he is not an open propagator. And Allāh knows best.

Commentary

The author tackles the debate regarding the narration of an agent of bid’a (mubtadi‘) by dividing the innovation into two types. The first, bid‘a mukaffara, is where the belief in question is so severe and deviant that it can no longer be considered as part of Islam. For instance, if a person believes that Muh̄ammad is not the last Messenger of God, a matter which is proven by unanimous consensus in Islam, then the innovation is deemed as bid‘a mukaffara. The second, bid‘a mufassaq̣a, is where the belief in question leads to deviance or wrongdoing but not disbelief, like believing in the created nature of the Qur’ān (khalq al-Qur’ān). Implicitly, this also shows the role the ijmâ‘ plays: that to some extent, the consensus decides what is considered as innovation and what is not.

Owing to the importance of this issue, it is necessary to first begin with outlining the seriousness of bid‘a amongst the ḥadīth scholars. This is so we can evaluate whether Ibn 162 This is where a weak narrator has been opposed by someone more authoritative.

Hajar’s own writings on the issue reflect this. To conclude we will reflect on the strengths of his arguments as well as the weaknesses.

5.37.1 The seriousness of bid’a.

It is impossible to offer a full picture of how serious the issue of bid’a has been viewed in ‘ilm al-hadīth. A few points will be presented to at least show how a ḥadīth containing a mubtadi‘ reporter in its isnād is one of the most problematic in the discipline.

a. Ibn Sīrīn famously remarked:

People never used to ask others to name the isnāds. But when the discord (fitna) happened, they said: ‘name your men.’ Thus the people of the sunna would be viewed and their reports would be accepted, and the people of bid‘a would be viewed and their reports would be discarded. 163

Two points can be deduced from this remark. Firstly, isnāds did exist before Ibn Sīrīn’s (d. 110/729) time. This is because he only negated the naming of the isnād, not the existence of them. 164 Secondly, and importantly for our analysis here on bid’a, the remark explicitly ascribes the rise of ḥadīth examination to the appearance of heretical Muslims.

164 This saying has attracted more attention than it perhaps deserves, because many western observers see it as the pivotal means by which one can identify when the use of isnāds began. Schacht writes that the fitna (civil war) being referred to was the killing of Umayyad Caliph Walīd ibn Yazīd (126) (1959, 37). Juynboll believes that ‘Abd Allāh ibn al-Zubayr’s seizing control of Hijaz, which came to an end in 73/692, was the fitna being referred to. Conveniently, he dismisses a report from al-Bukhārī which clearly identifies the ‘first fitna’ as the killing of ‘Uthmān (in 35/656) as forged (1996, III, 305). Azami shows that al-Shawkānī’s work contained 42 spurious traditions about the Prophet, 38 regarding the first three caliphs, 96 about ‘Aīf and Fāṭima and 14 about Mu‘awiya (1992, 217). This suggests that the fitna started much earlier than otherwise depicted. Thus the quote is far from conclusive in suggesting that the fitna led to the use of isnāds amongst Muslims. Ibn Sīrīn could have easily meant that the isnād became common practice after
b. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī refers to a confession made by a shaykh from the Khārijites who said:

…look whom you take your religion from. For when we used to create a forged lie, we turned it into a ḥadīth. (al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī 1996, 1:210)

Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī suggests that the people of innovation should be abhorred since they were the one of the main culprits of forgery. On this basis, if there is any type of ḥadīth which requires precaution and close examination on the part of the ḥadīth masters, it is bid‘a.

c. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī cites Sufyān al-Thawrī, who said: ‘Allāh will not benefit someone from what has been heard from an innovator. And he who dictates from an innovator is diminishing Islam bit by bit’ (al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī 1996, 1: 210).

5.37.2. The Nuzhah on bid‘a.

Ibn Ḥajar’s section on bid‘a is a prime example of his diplomacy and pragmatism. He suggests that despite its seriousness, one cannot simply avoid reports from heretical Muslims. He explains that every sect accuses the other sect of being heretical and deviant from the truth. Sometimes they even exaggerate their claims and refer to the opposing groups as infidels. So if the ḥadīth was not to be accepted, then sects would not accept most reports since each sect would deem the others as disbelievers. A vast amount of the fitna, and that they did exist in less stringent form before this point. The quote certainly does not translate as ‘they used not to bother to ask for the isnād…’, like Burton has suggested (1994, 106). For an in-depth analysis of the origins of chains, the works of Azami (1992, 212-217), Juynboll (1996, III: 303-311) and Robson (1955) are worthy of mention.

hadīth literature would be disregarded purely on the basis that each sect considered the other as unworthy of acceptance. ‘Alī ibn al-Madīnī highlighted this point clearly when he remarked that if all Kūfī narrations were to be rejected [i.e. the Shī‘as], then the hadīth of the Prophet would all but disappear (al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī 1988, 129). Not the first time in the Nuzhah, we see that the rulings in the discipline aim to create a larger source as possible for hadīth literature. In this particular section, it means that the report of a mubtadi‘ is treated with cautionary acceptance.

This is not to say that the reports of all heretical Muslims are accepted. Rather, Ibn Ḥajar offers guidelines to clarify whose reports can be accepted and whose reports should be avoided. For example, he states that the report of a heretic will be accepted, so long as the reporter firmly believes in the prohibition of lying in prophetic narrations, since all scholars agree that the report of someone as such will be rejected. On this basis, the narrations of the Khaṭṭābiyya sect are not accepted.165 Al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī and al-Imām Abū Ḥanīfa stated that to use the testimony of the people of innovation (ahl al-ahwā‘) is permissible, except from a specific group of the Rāfiḍa (al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī 1988, 125-6). Abū Yūsuf allowed the narrations of innovators, except the Khaṭṭābiyya and Qadariyya sects (al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī 1988, 126).

This condition shows insight and sense from Ibn Ḥajar. On the one hand, it allows hadīth masters to use the reports from heretical Muslims (except the most serious ones) which then extends the pool of material they can work from. On the other hand, the refusal to accept all their reports shows the seriousness they attached to bid‘a.

165 This was a group named after their leader, Abū al-Khaṭṭāb from Kūfā. He was of the belief that ‘Alī was a senior deity and that Ja‘far al-Ṣādiq was a junior deity.
5.37.2. The Shooting Stars traditions.

However, it is the second condition which Ibn Ḥajar mentions that is more problematic. The Nuzhah states that the agent’s report is accepted if he does not openly propagate his bidʿa.166 Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī records a saying attributed to Ibn al-Mubārak, which shows how this condition works in practice:

…Yahyā ibn ‘Uthmān narrates from Nu‘aym ibn Ḥammād who said: ‘I heard Ibn al-Mubārak say when asked why he left the narration of ‘Amr ibn ‘Ubayd but accepted the narration of Hishām al-Dustawā‘ī and Sa‘īd [though all were innovators], “‘Amr used to propagate his beliefs” (al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī 1998, 127).

A similar expression is recorded from Yaḥyā ibn Ma‘īn and Ahmad ibn Ḥanbal, who again accepted the innovators who did not openly propagate their beliefs but rejected those who did (Ibid.).

Unfortunately, no guideline or methodology has been offered by the ḥadīth scholars as to how one can establish whether an innovator is promoting his beliefs in the narration. Presumably, traditions relating to the Islamic doctrines will be rejected, and ones relating to less important matters – perhaps on the respect for parents for instance – will be accepted. But there will inevitably be a grey area in between where it becomes difficult to establish whether a covert attempt to promote a certain belief is being attempted. In short, there is no clear method one can employ to establish whether there is a correlation between the matn and the narrator’s own belief and doctrine.

Adrien Leites has exposed this frailty quite comprehensively (in Motzki (ed.) 2000, 49-66). By analysing the ‘Shooting Stars’ traditions, he has argued that the different beliefs held by the opposing Sunnis and Shi’a about the nature of the Prophet has been expressed in subtle differences in various narrations.

Leites begins his analysis by citing the works of Tor Andrae, whose works showed that the figure of Muḥammad gave rise to two different conceptions of his prophethood (2000, 54) amongst Sunni and Shi’a scholars. According to the former, the Prophet is a mere man invested with the function of prophethood at a certain point in his life. According to the latter, Muḥammad is a superhuman being invested with the attribute of prophethood through an election preceding his terrestrial existence. This dichotomy forms the basis of Leites’s own interpretations.

With these two conceptions in mind, Leites offers an analysis of the traditions relating to the Shooting Stars. The Shooting Stars traditions relate to the practices which used to occur before the emergence of Islam. In the period prior to the appearance of the Prophet, the demons had a certain amount of autonomy to roam throughout the skies, but with the appearance of Islam, their powers were neutralised by shooting stars. Leites shows that the many traditions relating to this event and all have slight variations in the words of narration. But it is possible to divide them into two categories; those which state that the demonic powers ceased when the Prophet was born and secondly, those which state that it ceased when Muḥammad officially was bestowed with prophethood, at the age of forty (Ibid.).
Interestingly, Leites notes that the traditions which state that the ‘old order’ of demonic powers ceased with the prophethood of Muḥammad (i.e. when he reached forty) consist of mainly Sunni narrators (in Motzki (ed.) 2000, 55). For instance, the report by Yūnus ibn Bukayr and Ziyād ibn ‘Abd Allāh from Muḥammad ibn Ishāq, the words of narration read ‘When the Messenger of God was about to receive his call and when his mission was about to start’ (Ibid.). A report by Ibn Sa’d mentions the same meaning, as does a further report by Abū Nu’aym (The words are ‘When the day came on which the Messenger of God started the prophecy’).

Leites identifies that the only Sunni report which links the shooting stars with the birth of Muḥammad is via the chain of the Mawλā of ‘Uthmān Ma‘rūf ibn Kharrabūdh. The words of the tradition are:

Iblīs used to travel across the seven heavens. When Jesus was born, he was debarred from [entering] the three [upper] heavens but still had access to the four [lower] heavens. When the Messenger of God was born, he was debarred from [entering] the seven heavens, and the devils were pelted with stars (2000, 55).

The Sunni reports ascribe the occurrence of the shooting stars when Muḥammad was bestowed with prophethood at the age of forty, but Leites shows that all the Shi‘a reports ascribe the same occurrence with the birth of Muḥammad. For example, in a report adduced by Ibn Bābawayh, with a chain going back to Abān ibn ‘Uthmān (a disciple of Ja‘far al-Ṣādiq and Mūsā al-Kāzim), Āmina tells the story about the day Muḥammad was born:
When he fell onto the earth, he protected himself against [its impurities] with his hands and knees, and raised his head towards the sky. A light came out of me which illuminated what is between the heavens and the earth. The devils were pelted with stars, and they were debarred from [entering] the heavens (Ibid).

A question remains over the sole Sunni report of Ibn Kharrabūdh, which states that the shooting stars are associated with the birth of Muḥammad. This report aside, the pattern is uniform in that all the Sunni reports refer to the shooting stars with prophethood, and all the Shi‘a reports refer to it with the birth of Muḥammad. But Leites shows that Ibn Kharrabūdh himself has Shi‘a tendencies, thus completing the symmetry of the two contrasting camps of narrations. He writes:

In Sunni riḍāl literature, Ibn Kharrabūdh appears as a rather controversial figure, although it is his mere reliability as a transmitter that seems to have been questioned. It is Shi‘a riḍāl literature that provides us with a decisive piece of information, namely that Ibn Kharrabūdh was a disciple of Muḥammad al-Bāqir and Ja‘far al-Ṣādiq, and that he played an important role in the transmission of their teaching. On the basis of this evidence, and in the view of the ascription of al-Barqī’s report, we may conclude that the present report was originally transmitted by Shi‘a scholars on the authority of Ja‘far al-Ṣādiq, perhaps ultimately from him, and through a channel starting from Ibn Kharrabūdh (Leites 2000, 60).
In short then, Leites has found a degree of frailty in the conditions laid down by ḥadīth scholars like Ibn Ḥajar. Leites has shown it is difficult to determine whether a narrator is promoting his doctrine in the wording of the tradition. More importantly, the analysis from Leites shows how western writers can contribute to areas which the likes of Ibn Ḥajar have outlined. Muslims frequently dismiss the findings of non-Muslims in ḥadīth studies quite simply because it stems from non-Muslims. Leites’ extensive research shows there is no reason to adopt such a stance, since he has merely given a practical manifestation of a ruling that the Nuzhah itself outlines.

5.37.3. Conclusion.

The Nuzhah’s analysis does seem to treat bid‘a with considerable leniency, when compared with other types of rejected traditions. This leniency is exposed through many means:

a. Firstly, when introducing the section on the rejected traditions on the basis of defamation of the narrator (section 5.23), Ibn Ḥajar clarifies that he has listed them in order of the most severe to the least severe. On this basis, he believes that bid‘a is only the ninth worse type of ḥadīth from ten.

b. Secondly, Ibn Ḥajar’s preference to pragmatism means that in essence, there are few reports stemming from a mubtadi‘ that are rejected outright. So long as a reporter does not openly propagate his beliefs and does not believe in the permissibility of lying in traditions – which very few Muslims sects do – then the report is accepted.
c. Thirdly, in Ibn Ḥajar’s definition of ṣaḥīḥ, he clarified that the reporter must be known for his taqwā, namely his ability to refrain from forbidden acts. Mighālwi (2003, 353) writes that the term taqwā stipulates that the reporter must refrain from bid‘a. Yet, here we are led to believe that a reporter known for innovation is not rejected outright.

It can be argued therefore, that the stance taken by Ibn Ḥajar and his likes is a clear break from the early Muslims (like Ibn Sīrīn), who viewed the traditions of mubtadi’s very seriously. This argument is supported by the fact that Mālik (d. 179/795) did not accept the narrations of an agent of bid‘a, regardless of the nature of his bid‘a (Kamali 2005, 190). In the introduction to his Ṣaḥīḥ, al-Imām Muslim gives many examples of traditionists who were rejected because of their ill-beliefs. The classic masters attached importance to the close scrutiny of the isnād and matn precisely because of such people and their antics.

A case can thus be made to suggest that bid‘a has perhaps not been viewed with the required seriousness by Ibn Ḥajar it should have. It could be argued that Ibn Ḥajar was torn between practice and ideal when discussing the issue of bid‘a. Perhaps owing to the severe nature of bid‘a, as highlighted from the famous quote from Ibn Sīrīn, Ibn Ḥajar ideally would have desired to adopt a firm stance against the innovators and curb their influence in ḥadīth literature. But he also had to acknowledge the practice that preceded him. Many ḥadīth scholars prior to him had accepted the reports of an agent of bid‘a. Al-Imām al-Bukhārī relied on the innovator ‘Īmān ibn Ḥittān. Likewise Yaḥyā ibn Ma‘īn and Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal validated ‘Abd al-Ḥāmid ibn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Himmānī, who actively propagated his deviant beliefs (Kamali 2005, 191). Ibn Ḥajar found himself in a compellingly-difficult situation: a desire to highlight the seriousness of bid‘a along with an acceptance that ḥadīth masters before him did take reports from such men.

Not only did he have to acknowledge the practice that preceded him, but the reality of his time. Ibn Ḥajar lived in a turbulent political era that affected the religious climate too. Tensions were high between different denominations in Cairo and sometimes between different madhhabs (Broadbridge 1999, 89). Viewed from this angle, the section on bid‘a in the Nuzhah was the perfect antidote to the tense religious atmosphere he lived in, because he appeals to unity and tolerance.

Nor is this the first time we have seen this dilemma confront Ibn Ḥajar. In the section on mu‘allaq (5.18), we saw how Ibn Ḥajar had to simultaneously declare mu‘allaq as rejected and defend al-Bukhārī’s large-scale inclusion of such reports in his own Sahih. Owing to a drop in the chain, there is no real justification to accept a mu‘allaq report. But taking such a hard-line stance would mean that hundreds of mu‘allaq reports in al-Bukhārī’s Sahih would have to be declared as rejected. Due to his rank and position in the Muslim world, very few scholars would want the task of making such a statement. The solution taken by Ibn Ḥajar therefore was to reject such reports in general, but allow a loophole to cover al-Bukhārī’s large-scale inclusion of such reports. So Ibn Ḥajar observed the practice that had occurred before him and created the rulings attached to it accordingly.

Leading on from this, we can see that the Nuzhah is descriptive of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth and not prescriptive. By the time Ibn Ḥajar wrote this manual, the process of reporting and sharing traditions had ceased for half a millennium. The Nuzhah therefore laid down the laws of what had occurred and not what should occur.

5. 38. Mukhtalat- the Merged.

Then the bad memory – and this is the tenth reason for defamation in the reporter; and what is meant by this is the narrator’s ability to be correct is outweighed by his tendency to be incorrect – is of two types. If this attribute is permanent for the reporter in all states then this is shādhdh according to the opinion of some people of ḥadīth. Or if the bad memory is sudden on the reporter, either because of old age, or loss of sight or the burning of his books or its loss; in that he used to depend on them, reverted to memory and found that it worsened, than this is mukhtalat. The principle for it is that what was reported before the loss is accepted when one can [clearly] identify it [as belonging to the period before the loss]. And that which cannot be identified is paused upon, as is that in which it cannot be known either way. This is only identified by investigating those who took from him.

Commentary

In this last section on the rejected due to defamation in the reporters, Ibn Ḥajar refers to mukhtalat, where the ḥadīth is rejected due to the memory loss of the reporter. He explains that this can take on two forms and clearly explains the principle for each.

A third scenario is also described; where the ḥadīth scholars cannot clearly identify which period the ḥadīth in question belongs to – before or after memory loss. Ibn Ḥajar writes that such a report will be paused upon until further evidence comes to light. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ also adheres to this stance (1986, 392).\(^{169}\)

5.38.1 Conclusion.

To conclude this section of the Nuzhah that discusses all of the different types of rejected traditions, Ibn Ḥajar’s deserves praise for the overall clarity of the analysis. It is for most part well-arranged and well-defined. In particular, the length and depth of Ibn Ḥajar’s analysis of mawdū‘ is worthy of credit.

What the Nuzhah does quite effectively is shows that the Muslim scholars did not totally deny shortcomings and deficiencies in the system. In sufficient detail, the Nuzhah accepts that reporters were sometimes cheats, deceitful and forgetful. It accepts the mechanisms in place to preserve the ḥadīth corpus were sometimes not rigid enough. This itself is a great statement from the Muslim scholars; that they were fallible.

As a renowned ḥadīth master, Ibn Ḥajar did not want to highlight the shortcomings in ‘ilm al-ḥadīth per se. After all, this would be a source of embarrassment rather than pride. But instead, he wanted to show that paradoxically, the existence of rejected traditions proved the existence of authentic ones too. This is shown in his analysis of mawdū‘.

\(^{169}\) In a very useful section in his Muqaddima, Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ lists several narrators who did suffer from memory loss later in their life. Included in this list are the following:
(i) ‘Atā’ ibn al-Sā’īb. He suffered from memory loss late in his life and for that reason, only the reports of the elders (akābir) such as Sufyān al-Thawrī and Shu’ba are accepted. (ii) Abū Ishāq al-Sabī‘ī. Abū Ya’lā al-Khallīlī writes that Sufyān ibn ‘Uyayna heard from him after the memory loss. (iii) Sa’īd ibn Iyās al-Jurayrī. (iv) Sa’īd ibn Abī ‘Arāba. Yahyā ibn Ma’in remarked that he suffered from memory loss from 142/759 onwards. The reports of Yazīd ibn Hārūn from him are however legitimate. (v) Ḥusayn ibn ‘Abd al-Rahmān al-Kūfī. This is according to al-Nasā‘ī and others. (vi) Sufyān ibn ‘Uyayna. Yahyā ibn Qatā‘ān was reported to have said: ‘I testify that Sufyān ibn ‘Uyayna suffered from memory loss in 197 A.H. Thus whoever heard from him in this year and after it, then it is of no worth.’ Sufyān ibn ‘Uyayna died in 198 A.H. (vii) ‘Abd al-Razzāq ibn Hammām. Aḥmad ibn Hanbal said: ‘he went blind at the end of his life. He used to be prompted and he responded to it, but his reports after the blindness are worthless.’ (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 392-6).

5. 39. Ḥasan li-ghayrih

When supporting attestations from someone above him [in rank] or equal, but not less, is found for a reporter suffering from memory loss, or for a mastūr report, or for a mursal ḥadīth, or likewise for a mudallas report when the omission is not known, then the ḥadīth becomes ḥasan li-ghayrih, not li-dhātiḥ (per se). This is because each type of report has an equal chance of being correct and incorrect. When a supporting narration is found for one of them from the attesters, then one of the two possibilities is preferred and this then indicates that the ḥadīth is preserved. Thus it is promoted from the rank of ‘paused upon’ to the rank of the accepted. And Allāh knows best. Though it is promoted to the rank of accepted, it is short of the rank of ḥasan (and thus is called li-ghayrih), though some scholars have refused to call this type ḥasan.

And this concludes the discussion on that which pertains to the matn, in terms of acceptance and rejection.

Commentary

Ibn Ḥajar first identified the four types of accepted (ṣaḥīḥ li-dhātiḥ, ṣaḥīḥ li-ghayrih, ḥasan li-dhātiḥ, ḥasan li-ghayrih) in section 5.9, where he offered an in-depth analysis of the first. He then discussed ḥasan li-dhātiḥ briefly in section 5.10. Now, twenty-nine sections later, he identifies ḥasan li-ghayrih.

Seemingly, this is bad arrangement from Ibn Ḥajar since it would have made sense to discuss the four accepted together in one section. But in fact, it makes good sense to mention ḥasan li-ghayrih here, after the discussions he has covered in-between. The reason is because there are certain grades of report which are neither wholly accepted nor rejected, and are thus classified as ‘paused upon.’ Examples are like:

- When a ḥadīth is reported by someone who suffered from memory loss (5.38), and it cannot be identified when exactly the ḥadīth in question was reported, before or after memory loss.
- A mursal ḥadīth (5.19), namely where the reporter after the Successor is missing.
- A mudallas ḥadīth (5.21), when the omission is not known.

Such reports can be accepted and promoted from ‘paused upon’ to ḥasan li-ghayrih, when supporting narrations are to be found for it. So Ibn Ḥajar delays the discussion on ḥasan li-ghayrih (and mentions the paused upon and the rejected types in between) to show how they can be upgraded to this type of the accepted.

The section on ḥasan li-ghayrih also indicates how the technical terms were used to serve certain purposes in the era of Ibn Ḥajar. Before explaining how, it is important to note that Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ and al-Mayyānishī did not explicitly divide ḥasan into li-dhātih and li-ghayrih and nor did al-‘Irāqī. Ibn Ḥajar was the pioneer in this respect. As the above commentary has shown, finding a corroboration for a mursal or a mudallas report (and similar types which are normally rejected) means there is more chances of its authenticity. Rather than giving this newly-promoted type a new name, it has been given the name of ḥasan, albeit li-ghayrih. This is deliberate. Giving it a new, unrelated name would suggest that in terms of rank and ruling, it differs from the accepted ḥasan. Though in reality it was weak and rejected, labelling it as ḥasan (li-ghayrih) suggests that it is perfectly acceptable and fit for use in Islamic law and dogma. In short, the technical terms were used precisely by Ibn Ḥajar to dress the weak with a cloak of acceptance. This is turn would increase the pool of acceptable reports Muslims could claim to have access to.

At the end of this section, Ibn Ḥajar declares that this outline of ḥasan li-ghayrih ‘concludes the discussion on that which pertains to the matn, in terms of acceptance and rejection.’ In reality, references to the matn up until this point in the Nuzhah have been almost non-existent.

5. 40. Marfū‘ – The Raised.

Then the isnād – this is the path leading to the matn; and the matn is the dialogue at which the isnād terminates – either ends at the Prophet ☪, and the wording suggests either explicitly or implicitly that the transferred text is from his sayings ☪, or from his actions and from his silent approvals.

An example of an explicit (taṣrīḥ) marfū‘ from his sayings is that the Companion says: ‘I heard the Messenger of Allāh ☪ say x’, or ‘the Messenger of Allāh informed us (ḥaddathana) ☪ of x’ or the Companion or someone else says: ‘The Messenger of Allāh ☪ said x’, or ‘from (‘an) the Messenger of Allāh ☪ that he said x’ and its likes.

An example of an explicit (taṣrīḥ) marfū‘ from his actions is that the Companion says: ‘I saw the Messenger of Allāh ☪ do x’, or the Companion or someone else says: ‘the Messenger of Allāh ☪ used to do x.’
An example of an explicit (taṣrīḥ) marfūʿ from his silent approvals is that the Companion says: ‘I did x in the presence of the Prophet ﷺ’ or the Companion or someone else says: ‘such and such person did x in the presence of the Prophet ﷺ and he did not object to it.’

An example of an implicit (ḥukm) marfūʿ and not explicit from his sayings is when the Companion – who does not take biblical reports (isrāʾīliyyāt) – says something which does not concern his independent thought (ijtihād) and has no reference to an ambiguous word or commentary of a rare word. [For instance] informing of past events like the beginning of creation and the occurrences of the [previous] prophets (peace be upon them), or informing of future events, like the [forthcoming] calamities and events, and the descriptions of the Day of Judgement. And likewise, [when the Companion gives] information of an act which results in a specific reward or specific punishment, [this too will also be considered as marfūʿ implicitly].

This is given the ruling of marfūʿ because the information stipulates that there must be an informer for it, and in that in which there is no link to independent thought, it also demands that there is an informer for it. There is no informer for the Companions except the Prophet ﷺ, or [possibly] some people who report from the old scriptures. For this reason precaution is taken against it being the second type. When it is as such, then for it is the ruling as though he said: ‘The Messenger of Allāh ﷺ said x’. This is marfūʿ regardless of whether it originates from the one who heard from the Prophet [directly] or from him through a means.

An example of an implicit (ḥukm) marfūʿ from his actions is that the Companions does something that has no link with his own independent thought, and it becomes manifest that this action stemmed from the Prophet ﷺ. [This is] like what al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī said about the Prayer of Eclipse performed by ‘Alī ﷺ in which each unit consisted of more than one bowing.

An example of an implicit (ḥukm) marfū‘ from his silent approvals is that the Companion informs others that they used to perform a certain act in the time of the Prophet ﷺ. For indeed this has the ruling of being marfū‘ in the sense that it is clear the Prophet told them of it, as they had the full means to question him on religious affairs. Moreover, this was the period of divine revelation; no wrongful action occurred from the Companions on a continual basis except it was prohibited. Indeed Jābir ibn ʿAbd Allāh and Abū Sa‘īd (may Allāh be pleased with them) used this point to prove the permissibility of the withdrawal method [of contraception], in that they used to perform this whilst the Qur’ān was being revealed. If it was from the actions which were prohibited, then the Qur’ān would have outlawed it.

[Also] applicable to my saying ‘implicitly’ [in the text] is that which is mentioned through an indirect word (kināya) in the place of a direct word (ṣārīḥ), in relation to the Prophet ﷺ. [This is] like the saying of the Successor from a Companion: ‘he raises the ḥadīth (yarfā‘)’, or: ‘he narrates the ḥadīth’ (yarwī) or: ‘he ascribes the ḥadīth’ (yanmī), or: ‘the narration’ (riwāya) or: ‘he reaches it to’ (yablughu bihī) or: ‘he narrates it’ (rawā).

Sometimes they suffice with the saying with the omission of the speaker, and they intend the [omission to be the] Prophet. [This is] like the saying of Ibn Sīrīn from Abū Hurayra who said: ‘you will fight with a community…’. In the works of al-
Khaṭīb al-[Baghdādī] is the suggestion that this is the specific terminology of the people of Baṣra.

Amongst the possible words [of delivery] is the saying of the Companion: ‘from the sunna is x’. Thus most of the scholars are of the opinion that this is marfūʿ. Ibn ‘Abd al-Barr has transmitted a consensus on this matter. He said: ‘And when someone other than the Companions says this, then it is as such (namely marfūʿ), so long as it is not ascribed to another person, like ‘the sunna of the two ‘Umars.’'¹⁷⁰

In saying that there is a consensus on this is contentious, as al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī has two opinions on this issue. Abū Bakr al-Ṣayrafi has said that such a saying is not marfūʿ, along with Abū Bakr al-Rāzī from the Ḥanafīs and Ibn Ḥazm from the Ahl al-ẓāhir. Their evidence is that the [word] sunna can be used for the Prophet and others. The answer to this is that the possibility of the sunna of other than the Prophet being meant is far-fetched. For al-Imām al-Bukhārī has recorded in his Ṣaḥīḥ in the ḥadīth of Ibn Shihāb, from Sālim ibn ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Umar, from his father; in the story of the pilgrims when he said: ‘If you intend the sunna, then leave before the Prayer.’ Ibn Shihāb said: ‘I asked Sālim: ‘Did the Prophet do this?’ He replied: ‘And what do they mean by sunna except his sunna?’ So Sālim transmitted – who is one of the seven jurists from the people of Madīna and one of the ḥāфиз from the Successors – that when the Companions use the term ‘sunna’ they only mean the sunna of the Prophet ☝️.

As for the opinion of some, that if it is marfūʿ, then why do they not say: ‘the Prophet ☝️ said’, then the answer is that they left [the words of] conviction due to piety and precaution. An example of this is the saying of Abū Qilāba, from Anas that: ‘From the sunna is that when a man marries a virgin over a non-virgin, then he stays with the virgin for seven days.’ This report has been recorded in the two Ṣahīḥs. Abū Qilāba said: ‘If I wished, I could have said that Anas reported this marfū‘ from the Prophet ﷺ.’ In other words, had he said such, he would not have lied, because saying ‘from the sunna’ implies this, but it is better to mention it with the [exact] words the Companion did.

From the forms of marfū‘ [also] is the saying of the Companion ‘we were ordered x’ or ‘we were prohibited from x’. The dispute in this is the same as the previous dispute, because the generality of the statement apparently ascribes it to the one who orders and prohibits, and this is the Messenger ﷺ.

A group [of scholars] have disputed this and have held on to the possibility that what is meant is something (or someone) other than the Prophet, like the order of the Qur’ān, or the order of the Consensus or the order of some of the caliphs or the order of the derived ruling. The answer given is that the default position is the Prophet and anything else is [merely] a possibility. It is most likely to be the Prophet since whosoever is under the rule of a leader, when he says ‘I have been ordered’ it is not understood from this except that the one ordering is the leader.

As for the opinion of those who say that the Companion could think something which is not an order, as an order, then there is no specification in this matter and in fact is possible when there is clarification in when he says: ‘the Prophet ﷺ ordered us x.’ This is a weak possibility because [all of] the Companions are credible and competent Arabic speakers. They would not say such a thing except after assurance.
Also from the forms of marfū is their saying: ‘we used to do x’. This too has the ruling of marfū, like it has been mentioned.

From the forms of marfū is when the Companion decrees an action as being the obedience of Allāh and His Messenger, or the disobedience. [This is] like the saying of ‘Ammār: ‘Whosoever fasts on the day of doubt, then he has shown disobedience to Abū al-Qāsim’. This has the ruling of marfū too because it apparently seems he has taken this from him

Having completed the discussions relating to the matn (text), Ibn Ḥajar proceeds to analyse aspects relating to the isnād. To commence this section, he offers a detailed explanation of marfū, which perhaps is the longest section in the Nuzhah devoted to a particular type.

In its simplest form, marfū is a ḥadīth ascribed to the Prophet ﷺ, regardless of whether this is a saying, action or silent approval. Though in essence, marfū is of three types – the Prophet’s words, actions or silent approvals – Ibn Ḥajar’s analysis clearly shows that marfū can take on numerous forms. Indirectly, the text indicates that like before (with ‘azīz and mursal), the Nuzhah lays down rulings that extend the ḥadīth literature pool, not reduce it. At first sight, marfū should only be that which stems from the Prophet. But the wording used by the Companion (or someone else) and the nature of the 171 There is no difference whether the actual chain is continuous or not. Hence, a marfū ḥadīth can also be mawsūl, mursal, muttašil or munqati (al-Suyūṭi 1971, 1: 184; Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 45). There is also no difference if the last narrator is a Companion or someone below him. However, al-Ḥāfiz Abū Bakr ibn Thābit is of the opinion that a report is only classified as marfū when the Companions report it. On this basis, he does not consider a mursal from a Successor as marfū (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 45). Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādi too voices the same opinion in al-Kifāya (1988, 58).

172 Al-Suyūṭi mentions a fourth type; when the Companions describe the physical and moral characteristics of the Prophet, then this too is considered as marfū (1972, 1: 187).
text can help us declare a ḥadîth as marfūʿ though it apparently seems otherwise. The definition and forms of marfūʿ offered in the Nuzhah suggests that there is an extensive and vast pool of material available, not a restricted one.

In this long text, the first six forms of marfūʿ outlined by Ibn Ḥajar can be summarised as follows:

<thead>
<tr>
<th>Type</th>
<th>Sub-Type</th>
<th>Example.</th>
</tr>
</thead>

<tr>
<td>Marfūʿ</td>
<td>1. Qawl taṣrīḥ</td>

<td>2. Qawl ḥukm</td>
<td>Ibn Masʿūd said: ‘Whosoever approaches a magician or fortune-teller, then he has disbelieved in that which has been revealed to the Prophet.’ Similarly, those sayings that do not have any link with the reporter’s own independent thought, and when it stems from a Companion not known to take biblical reports.</td>

<td>5. Taqrīr taṣrīḥ</td>
<td>The report mentioning that a lizard was consumed</td>

The above table shows suggests a rigid pattern since the three main types (qawl, fi’l and taqrīr) are further divided into two types, explicit and implicit. Furthermore, these six make some religious points which perhaps the author felt were important to reflect. These points are that:

a. The Prophet was aware of everything that his Companions did and said.
b. The Companions’ only source of guidance in sharī‘a affairs was the Prophet.
c. Also, it works on the notion that their ijtihād and independency counted for very little, in comparison to the Prophet. This is why the Nuzhah states that ‘Alī performed the Eclipse Prayer in an unconventional manner in that he performed the bowing (rukū’) more than once in each unit of Prayer. Ibn Ḥajar asserts that such an action could only have stemmed from a source, namely the Prophet. 173

Viewed from this angle, we can appreciate the multi-faceted analysis employed by Ibn Ḥajar for marfū‘. It allows the reader to understand what constitutes marfū‘. In the wider context, it shows the flawless nature of the Prophet, his all-encompassing wisdom and knowledge and the exalted ranks of the Companions, for whom guidance meant prophetic guidance only.

173 Al-Munāwī writes that al-Baqā‘ī is of the opinion that the Prayer being referred to by al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī was the Prayer performed during an earthquake, not an eclipse and thus a misunderstanding exists on the matter. The eclipse prayer has been proven directly from the actions of the Prophet (when his son passed away) and thus the legitimacy of it is proven from the Prophet explicitly, not through the means of ‘Alī’s prayer (al-Munāwī 1999, 2: 184).
However, not all Muslim scholars agree with the three points mentioned above. For example, al-Ḥākim and al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī point out that a possibility exists that the Prophet did not know of the Companions’ actions (al-Munāwī 1999, 2: 186). For example, it may not have been possible for the Prophet to know that Jābir practiced the withdrawal method of contraception. Likewise, Haddad lists several religious acts performed by the Companions in which they applied their own ījtihād (2005, pp. 94-102), including the raising of the hands in the witr prayer for the qunāt. This shows that the definition of marfū’ sketched by Ibn Ḥajar is not without reservations from Muslim scholars, let alone non-Muslim ones (which shall be addressed later). Further clarity is required, especially with the case when the Companions perform an act. Al-Suyūṭī has provided some of that clarity. He writes that if the Companions report that they used to perform a certain action and they ascribe it to the time of the Prophet (for example, ‘we used to do x in the time of the Prophet’), only then will it be considered as marfū’. Mīghālwī cites the report mentioned in al-Nāṣā’ī and Ibn Māja where the Companions affirmed:

We used to eat horse meat in the time of the Prophet (2003, 498).

If they merely say ‘we used to do x’ with no ascription to the time of the Prophet, then this is deemed as mawqūf (the actions of the Companions). For example, Jābir ibn ‘Abd Allāh reports that:
When we used to climb upwards, we would say Allâh Akbar, and when we used to descend we would say Subhân Allâh.

Here, Jâbir did not ascribe this to the time of the Prophet and therefore it is declared as mawqûf rather than marfuʿ (al-Suyûṭî 1972, 1: 185).

Other than these six types, Ibn Ḥajar does mention four other forms of marfuʿ, two of which are certainly more contentious:

a. When the Successor refers to a Companion and states ‘he raises the ḥadîth (yarfaʾ), or ‘he narrates the ḥadîth (yarwî) or similar words. This, the author writes, is considered as marfuʿ by virtue of the words of delivery employed.

b. Also considered as marfuʿ is when a Companion decrees an action as being the ‘obedience of Allah and his Prophet’, or his ‘disobedience’.

c. When the Companion states that ‘we were ordered x’ or ‘we were prohibited from x’. Ibn Ḥajar works on the assumption that when a Companion makes such a comment in the passive state, then it must mean the Prophet. This assumption, again, is based on the idea that the Companions’ only source of guidance in religious affairs was the Prophet.

Both from Muslims and non-Muslim observers, this assumption is questionable. Al-Suyûṭî writes that such a statement is not given the ranking of marfuʿ, because the one ordering could be the Qur’ân or one of the caliphs (1971, 1: 188). Goldziher asks us to entertain the possibility that early Muslims held a different meaning of sunna, namely ‘all that corresponded to the traditions of the Arabs, and the customs and habits of their ancestors’ (1971, 25). On this basis, when a Companion says ‘we were ordered x’, it does not automatically mean the Prophet ordered it, rather it could have meant the living tradition of the Arabs.

d. When the Companion says: ‘from the sunna is x.’ An example is the quote of ‘Alī who said:

From the sunna is to place the palm on the [other] palm in Prayer beneath the navel. (in al-Suyūṭī 1971, 1: 188).

It is this last type that needs further analysis, owing to the rich debate around it. For Ibn Ḥajar what does sunna mean and what does it encompass?

In principle, the Nuzhah indicates that when the Companion says ‘from the sunna is x’, then it is given the ruling of marfū’, meaning it can safely be ascribed to the Prophet. Therefore Ibn Ḥajar saw the sunna reflective of the Prophet’s own example. In order to suggest the strength of this, he cites the opinion of Ibn ‘Abd al-Barr in the Nuzhah, who states that a consensus exists on the fact that such a statement is deemed as marfū’.

However, the Nuzhah cautiously accepts this general observation because it suggests that the term sunna does not always mean prophetic sunna. This is because Ibn Ḥajar writes when a non-Companion uses the phrase ‘from the sunna is x’, then we have to evaluate whether he has ascribed it to someone else, like the ‘sunna of ‘Umar’ or the ‘sunna of Abū Bakr.’ Hence, it is an indirect acceptance that sunna does not always mean prophetic sunna. In fact, the Nuzhah clarifies that many scholars actually say that when someone says ‘from the sunna is x’ it is not marfū’. They include Abū Bakr al-Ṣayrafi, Abū Bakr al-Rāzī and Ibn Ḥazm. These scholars write that the word ‘sunna’ can refer to other beings too, not just the Prophet.

But again, Ibn Ḥajar treads cautiously. Yes, sunna can mean many things, but the chances of it referring to someone other than the Prophet are small. The Nuzhah wanted to highlight this fact, by citing the example of al-Bukhārī, who narrates a ḥadīth describing the Prayer on the day of ‘Arafa. Ibn ‘Umar informed the pilgrims: ‘If you intend the sunna then leave before the Prayer’. Someone asked: ‘is this what the Prophet did?’ Ibn ‘Umar replied ‘By saying sunna, could it refer to anyone else?’

In other words, when early Muslims used the term sunna, in particular the Companions, then the chances that they meant something other than the prophetic sunna were virtually non-existent.

5.40.1. Conclusion.

The importance of identifying what is considered as marfūʿ and what is not cannot be over-emphasised. Without a clear indication and dividing line, there is no means by which we can identify what is rightly attributed to the Prophet as his saying or action and what is not. Ibn Ḥajar’s analysis goes a long way in explaining what exactly marfūʿ, and subsequently what sunna encapsulates.

We note some indecision and lack of certainty from Ibn Ḥajar regarding what the sunna encapsulates. I believe this indecision is totally justified. This is because in reality, what the term means exactly is very difficult to pinpoint. No one – Muslim or non-Muslim scholar – has really been able to provide a definite answer. At best, a rough guide can be provided and the Nuzhah has done well to provide that.
Literally speaking, there are difficulties with the term. The ‘sunna’ merely means ‘path’ or ‘example’ and is not used exclusively to refer to the example of the Prophet.

Even the Prophet himself said: ‘Adhere to my sunna and the sunna of the Rightly-Guided Caliphs’, thus suggesting the actions of others too can be classified as ‘sunna’.

But viewed in a different light, this ḥadīth actually proves that the dispute over the term sunna is purely academic. Implicitly, the Prophet indicated that his sunna and the Companions’ sunna are the same thing, that following ‘Umar was in essence following the Prophet. The Prophet himself encouraged Muslims to emulate the examples of his Companions, precisely because he knew they were following his footsteps. 174

The wide-ranging use of the term sunna too has led to confusion. According to Schacht, the term ‘sunna’ only came to refer to the Prophet thanks to the efforts of al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī (Brown 1999, 7) and that prior to this period, the Muslims took the literal meaning of ‘sunna’ and thus applied it to refer to anyone’s example. But it is possible to acknowledge al-Shāfi‘ī’s efforts and believe that Muslims held value to the Prophet’s sunna from an early period. As Brown himself acknowledges, al-Shāfi‘ī was largely responsible for developing ‘a coherent system of jurisprudence’ (1999, 7). In order to differentiate between the different sources of Islamic law, al-Shāfi‘ī restricted the term ‘sunna’ to the Prophet’s sayings and actions, so that extracted laws could be systemically ascribed to the Qur‘ān, sunna or scholarly consensus. Additionally, more confusion is likely when the jurists use the term to describe an act as sunna, as opposed to mandāb, ḥarām or mubah in the field of sharī‘a.

174 ‘Adhere to my sunna and the sunna of the rightly-guided caliphs…’ Sunan al-Tirmidhī, Book of Knowledge, Chapter: what has been mentioned about adhering to the sunna and refraining from bid‘a. hadith no. 2600.
Besides the analysis in the Nuzhah, we should seriously entertain the possibility that early Muslims differentiated between sunna and al-sunna. Azami points out that:

> Sometimes the Arabic definite article (Al) was affixed to the word sunna to denote the sunna of the Prophet, while the general use of the word continued, though decreasing day by day. At the end of the second century it began to be used exclusively in the legal books for the norms set by the Prophet or norms deduced from the Prophet’s norm (1977, 4).

Azami’s interpretation is useful in allowing us to accommodate the view of Brown and Schacht, as well as maintaining the view that early Muslims did use the term sunna to refer to the actions and sayings of the Prophet. If Muslims did use sunna to refer to the example of other prominent people other than the Prophet in the first century, they used the term sunna rather than al-sunna.

The writings of non-Muslims suggest the gulf between the sunna of the Prophet and the sunna of the Companions. Juynboll highlights examples where ‘Umar acted contrary to the sunna regarding the spoils of war (1996, V:101). In my opinion, such opinions have come about because all of the Companions have been treated with equal regard. As the next section will highlight, some Companions were known for their judicial insight more than others. This is why ‘Umar acted with more autonomy than, for example, Abū Hurayra.

A closer look reveals that Juynboll is actually in closer agreement with Muslims than one perhaps first assumes regarding the usage of the term sunna. Though he advocates the varied use of the term sunna in the first one hundred and fifty years – to mean the example of Muḥammad and others – he does also accept that divorcing the term from him is all but impossible:

…But since it is inconceivable, given the existence of the concept sunna and given the prestige the Prophet had acquired especially towards the end of his life, that Muḥammad’s actions would not inspire his associates to follow his example, we can safely assume that at least a significant part of the sunnas – preserved in later ḥadīth collections and allegedly instituted during his lifetime – were indeed his (1996, V: 100).

Moreover, he accepts that in ḥadīth literature, the use of the term sunna overwhelmingly refers to the sunna of the Prophet (1996, V: 101). He successfully shows the term can be applied in many different ways, but this is not from ḥadīth literature, instead it is from the awā‘il literature (1996, V: 103) and from the kalām compilations (1996, V: 104). Muslims too would not doubt that this is the case. No Muslim suggests that sunna is exclusive to the Prophet alone. But in ḥadīth literature, the default meaning is sunna al-nabī like the Nuzhah indicates. On this point, Juynboll agrees. Ibn Manṣūr’s Lisān al-‘arab lists many meanings of the word (1988, x: pp. 234-8). The Qur’an mentions the word sixteen times, mostly to refer to the ‘way’ God has dealt with the disobeying people. The Prophet himself used the word to refer to a ‘bad practice’.\(^\text{175}\) Azami quotes nine different ways the term sunna has been used in early fiqh-ḥadīth literature (1996, pp. 31-33). Thus if a case is being made to suggest that sunna does not necessarily refer to the example of the Prophet, there is no disagreement. Here, the Muslims and the non-Muslims converge.

Where the disagreement lies is in the implications. The western scholars’ extensive observations on the concept sunna are aimed at proving that early Muslims had no real idea that they had to follow the example of the Prophet, and instead they preferred to continue old practices, the ‘living tradition’. This is why Juynboll suggests that the verse describing the Prophet as a ‘perfect example’ is particular to a certain incident; aimed at those who did not march with the Prophet against the Confederates (Juynboll 1996, V: 107). This is the reason why Juynboll wants to suggest that hikma in the verse translates as ‘knowledge and insight’ rather than the sunna of the Prophet. This is why he makes the point to indicate that the Qur’ān mentions sunna sixteen times, but none refer to the sunna of the Prophet (Juynboll 1996, V: 101). This is why Schacht translates sunna as the ‘living tradition’ of the community, which is unrelated to the model behaviour of the Prophet (1959, 29). And this is why Goldziher is keen to suggest that the ḥadīth had a ‘troubled existence’ in the first Islamic century and that it was the likes of ‘Umar II who set out the task to revive the sunna and abolish the bid‘a (1971, 43). Paradoxically, this last observation from Goldziher actually proves the existence of the sunna of the Prophet in the first Islamic century. This is because sunna and bid‘a are opposing terms; one can only abolish the sunna if one knows the sunna originally. Additionally, one can only revive the sunna if it existed in the first place.

There are implications for the Muslims too. Confusion surrounding the term sunna suggests that early Muslims had no real role model in the Prophet, that the Qur’ān gave no weight to his precedence, and that it was only al-Shāfi‘ī who saved Muslims from this confusion. There would be no meaning to the countless verses in the Qur’ān which stress the need for Muslims to express obedience to the Prophet (33:21, 4:64, 3:32, 3:132, 4:59, 4:65, 59:7). Because this is difficult for the Muslims, they assert that the word sunna as the model of the Prophet came into existence during the lifetime of Muḥammad (Azami 1996, 31). They show that the uniformity in the core aspects of rituals and worships could only have come about if the Muslims took their example from one source, Prophet Muḥammad.

What this shows is how the starting point for the Muslims and the non-Muslims affects the end conclusion. Because some non-Muslim academics start with a negative assumption about Muḥammad, it affects the direction of the research. And because Muslim academics start with the positive assumption that Muḥammad was the mercy for all mankind, the most perfect of God’s creation and the final Messenger of God, then this too affects the nature and direction of the research.

On a final note, we return to the Nuzhah in particular. It was mentioned in section 5.2.1 that Ibn Ḥajar had chosen to define ḥadīth in the opening section on khabar, but left the discussions on sunna much later on in this section. Having analysed both sections, it seems that owing to the complexity surrounding sunna, it made sense to define it much later in a book designed for first time readers of ʿilm al-ḥadīth. It also shows that perhaps Ibn Ḥajar did agree with Goldziher in some respects. This is because Ibn Ḥajar defined ḥadīth in a much narrower sense whereas his analysis of sunna suggested a much-wider scope. Goldziher agrees when he suggests that hadīth is ṣunna though not every ṣunna is a ḥadīth (1971, 24).

5.41. Al-Ṣaḥābī- the Companions.

[The ḵaṣnād either ends at the Prophet] or at the Companion (Ṣaḥābī) in a similar fashion. In other words, like what has passed in that the wording clarifies that the transmitted [text] is from the saying of the Companion, or from his actions or from his silent approvals. Not all of the types previously mentioned are applicable to this, but rather most of it. Similarity does not entail resemblance in every aspect.

Since this short treatise covers all of the branches of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth, I have embarked on offering a definition of the Companions and who they are. Thus I say [that a Ṣaḥābī is] “he who met the Prophet √ as a believer in him and then died as a Muslim, even if he became an apostate in between, according to the most correct opinion.” What is meant by meeting the Prophet is a more general application than sitting with him, walking with him and going to one another; even if they did not talk to one another [he is still considered as a Companion]. Inclusive in this is one seeing the other, regardless of whether this occurs through his own means or through the means of someone else.

178 The person in question must have seen the Prophet as a Muslim and as someone who believed in him as a Prophet. This thus excludes the disbelievers like Abū Jahl and excludes those who met him, but as a believer in previous prophets like Jesus.

179 He must then have died as a Muslim for him to be classified as a Companion. This excludes the apostates such as ‘Abd Allāh ibn Jaḥsh, Rabī’a ibn Umayya and Ibn Khaṭṭāl (Mīgḥālwī 2003, 517).
Referring it with ‘meeting’ rather than ‘seeing’ [the Prophet] is preferred, because with the latter, the definition would not include Ibn Umm Maktūm and his likes from the blind, as they are undoubtedly [classified as] Companions.

‘Meeting’ in this definition here is like the *jins*181 and my saying ‘as a believer’ is like a faṣl that excludes those who achieved the meeting but as a disbeliever. My saying ‘in him’ is the second faṣl that excludes those who met him as a believer but in the state of believing in someone else from the [previous] prophets. But does this exclude he who met the Prophet as a believer [prior to the public announcement of Prophet-hood] and knew he would be declared a Prophet [later], and then did not live until the announcement? In this is a dispute.182

My saying ‘and [then] died as a Muslim’ is the third faṣl which excludes those who became apostates after meeting him as a believer and then subsequently died as a disbeliever, like ‘Abd Allāh ibn Jaḥṣ and Ibn Khaṭl.

My saying ‘even if he became an apostate in between’ – namely between meeting the Prophet as a believer and between dying as a Muslim – means the attribute of Companionship still remains, irrespective of whether he reverted to Islam during the Prophet’s life [or not] or whether he met the Prophet again [as a reverted Muslim] or not.

180 Ibn Ḥajar chose deliberately not to define a Companion as someone who ‘saw’ the Prophet, because that would then exclude the likes of Ibn Umm Maktūm, who was blind.

181 Ibn Ḥajar employs terminology from balāgha (prose) to explain how he has expressed the definition of a Companion. A jins is like a general statement and any exceptions are expressed through the means of a faṣl. For example, ‘all the Muslim, male students came to class’ is a general statement regarding who came to class. From the statement, we readily understand that no non-Muslims came to class, no females did and no non-students did. These three points are classified as the faṣl for the jins.

182 Disputed are the group of people who saw the Prophet before he officially announced his Prophet-hood and knew he was a Prophet, like Baḥṭira the monk.
My saying ‘according to the most correct opinion’ is an indication of the dispute [that exists] regarding the issue [of defining the Companion]. The story of al-Ash’ath ibn Qays gives preference to the first opinion; for he is from the ones who became an apostate and he was brought to Abū Bakr as a prisoner. He then reverted to Islam and Abū Bakr accepted it and he married him to his sister. No one [from the scholars or other Companions] refrained from calling him a Companion and no one refused to mention his ḥadīths in the musnads and other sources.

Two notes: One of them is that there is no hiding the fact of the preferred rank of him who adhered to the Prophet ﷺ for a long time, fought with him or died under his commandership over one who did not stay with him for long, did not participate with him in the [key] events, or spoke to him or walked with him only rarely, or saw him as a child. This is despite the fact that the honour of Companionship is still applicable to all of them.

The ḥadīth of one who did not hear from him is mursal in terms of narration, though they themselves are classified as Companions, as they attained the honour of seeing him.

The second of the two notes is that a person’s Companionship is known by the means of mutawātir183, through the dispersed and famous nature of this fact184,

183 For example, the fact that Abū Bakr was a Companion is known by definitive means, as he was the one being referred to with the Prophet in the verse: ‘For Allāh did indeed help him, when the Unbelievers drove him out: he had no more than one companion; they two were in the cave, and he said to his companion, "Have no fear, for Allāh is with us"’ (9: 40). All Qurʾān experts are unanimous that the ‘companion’ being referred to here is Abū Bakr. Likewise, Zayd ibn Ḥāritha is known as a Companion through the means of tawātir, as he is the only Companion mentioned explicitly in the Qurʾān, in the verse: ‘Then when Zayd had dissolved (his marriage) with her…’ (33: 37) through the means of another Companion informing such a credible Successor informing such or through the means of the person affirming it himself, when his claim is plausible. A group of ḥadīth scholars have expressed concern over this last means in the sense that such a claim from someone is akin to someone claiming ‘I am credible’ and [thus] this requires [further] analysis.

184 Mīghālī writes that Ḍamām ibn Thalaba and ‘Akāsha ibn Muhṣin are deemed as Companions through this mean (2003, 519).

Commentary

As Ibn Ḥajar notes in the text of the Nuzhah, it is important to identify and know who the Companions were. One benefit is being able to identify the mursal from the muttaṣil ḥadīth (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 206). Owing to the importance of this issue, Ibn Ḥajar firstly offers a comprehensive definition of the Companion (Ṣahābī) and then offers his own commentary and analysis of the definition. The definition he adheres to for a Ṣahābī is as follows:

185 For instance, when Ḥamama ibn Abī Ḥamama died as a result of a stomach illness during the caliphate of ‘Umar, Abū Mūsā remarked that he heard the Prophet once inform him that he would die as a martyr (Mīghālwi 2003, 519). In Islam, there are several types of ‘martyr’. In a report recorded by al-Bukhārī, the Prophet affirmed that a person who dies in a plague, who dies through drowning, who dies under a collapsed building and dies due to a stomach illness are all considered as martyrs (shahīd).

186 Precisely, this means that if someone claimed to be a Companion one hundred years after the Prophet, it would be rejected. The Prophet himself was reported to have said to his Companions: ‘Do you observe this very night? For verily, one hundred years after tonight, no one present here will remain on the face of the earth.’ (cited in Mīghālwi 2003, 520-1). According to the report narrated by Jābir, the Prophet said these words one month prior to his demise (Mīghālwi 2003, 521).

Some people did erroneously claim to be Companions when in fact they were not, such as Abū Dunyā al-Ashajj and Ratan Hindī (Mīghālwi 2003, 520). The scholars’ research and the above prophetic report were critical in rejecting such claims.

Not all scholars believe that the person’s own statement is sufficient to determine whether he is a Companion or not. This is because if someone says ‘I am credible’, his opinion on himself is not accepted. Hence, scrutiny is essential.
A ScrollPane is he/she who met the Prophet as a believer in him and [then] died as a Muslim, even if he/she became an apostate in between, according to the most correct opinion.

Two important facts are crucial to analyse with regards to the Companions. Firstly, in terms of religious rank, Muslim scholars accept that all Companions hold an equal, exalted rank, as testified by the Prophet himself and the Qur’an. Secondly, it is agreed that the conventional investigations required to establish the accuracy and credibility of a ḥadīth reporter are wavered for the Companions.\(^{187}\)

Ibn Ḥajar and other ḥadīth scholars have treated these two points as fundamentally related. We do not need to check the accuracy of a reporter precisely because their character is described as exemplary by the Qur’an. But an observer can argue that the two points need to be treated differently as in reality, they belong to different spheres. The Companions’ exalted rank is due to their religious sacrifice and assistance to Islam. This is different to their academic capability as ḥadīth reporters. Certainly, it is not contentious to decree all Companions as equal in terms of religious worth, but the same cannot always be said regarding their academic and intellectual capability. The following points show why a strong case can be made to treat the Companions differently; theologically and academically.

\(^{187}\) Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī writes: ‘It is not necessary for anyone to analyse their character once Allāh has done so, He Who knows their inner state’ (1988, 46).
Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ writes: ‘…[Mursal al- ScrollPane] has the same principle of a ḥadīth which is connected, because the narrator took the ḥadīth from a Companion. And not knowing from which Companion the ḥadīth was taken is not defamatory, because all Companions are ṭudāl (credible)’ (1986, 56). See also al-Suyūṭī (1972, 2: 215-6).
a. Firstly, some Companions stayed with the Prophet longer than others. Though this may not affect their spiritual position, it will certainly affect their ability to comprehend what they are transmitting. It is strange that Ibn Ḥajar accepts that some Companions were better than others because the amount of time they spent with the Prophet\textsuperscript{188}, but then does not elaborate on the ramifications of this fact in the sphere of ḥadīth reporting.

b. Secondly, some Companions were known as specialists in sharī'a affairs whereas others were not. The most experienced in religious decrees was Ibn ‘Abbās, as certified by Ahmad ibn Ḥanbal (Mīghālīwī 2003, 526). He is followed by the senior Companions, who Masrūq classifies as six; ‘Umar, ‘Alī, Ubayy ibn Ka‘b, Zayd ibn Thābit, Abū al-Dardā’ and Ibn Mas‘ūd (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 218: Mīghālīwī 2003, 527). Needless to say, this suggests that not all were academically equal.

c. Kamali is of the opinion that the development of jarḥ & ta‘dīl can be traced back to the prominent Companions such as Abū Bakr, Ibn ‘Abbās, Anas ibn Mālik and ‘Alī (2005, 81). What this implicitly means is that they felt the need to evaluate and analyse each others’ statements. If all the Companions were academically equal, then there would be no need for them to approve or disapprove each others’ reports.

d. The Companions’ ‘adāla (credible nature) is not synonymous with their immunity from mistakes. Al-Bukhārī reports the statement of the Prophet, delivered when some news broke out in Madīna that considerable wealth had arrived from the collection of jīzā. He said:

\textsuperscript{188} He writes in the Nuzhah: ‘there is no hiding the fact of the preferred rank of he who adhered to the Prophet \( \mathbb{R} \) for a long time, fought with him or died under his commandship over one who did not stay with him for long, did not participate with him in the [key] events, or spoke to him or walked with him only rarely, or saw him as a child. This is despite the fact that the honour of Companionship is still applicable to all of them.’
By God! I do not fear poverty for you. I only fear that when this material world has been opened to you, as was opened to those who came before you, it may distract you from the right path, just as it distracted them (fa-tulhikum kamā alhathum).

In another version of the same report, the last three words have been recorded as fatuhlikukum kamā ahlakathum (it will destroy you as it destroyed them). The two variations are most probably due to two different Companions hearing the words of the Prophet differently, as both variations sound the same and can apply to the context (Kamali 2005, 98-99). What this shows is that the Companions may be dedicated servants of Islam, but they were still human and were thus prone to mistakes.

In short, my thesis is that the Companions as religious men and the Companions as hadīth reporters needs to be viewed separately, but it seems that very few Muslim scholars have departed from the official view that all Companions are credible, regardless of age and academic ability. With difficulty, I have come across three such scholars only who indirectly suggest that not all the Companions are equal. One of these exceptions is al-Māzarī, when he wrote:

By the statement ‘All Companions are credible’, we do not mean every person who saw the Prophet on one occasion, or visited him momentarily and met him [briefly] for a moment. What we mean are those people who stayed with the Prophet for a considerable amount of time, served him and assisted him. (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 214).

Perhaps al-Māzīrī’s definition was an acknowledgement that intellectually, the rank of those Companions who stayed with the Prophet for a longer period is much greater, and thus their capacity as ḥadīth reporters will therefore also be greater. But al-Māzīrī’s opinion is not considered strong amongst the Muslim scholars. Al-‘Alā’ī was quick to refute al-Māzīrī because holding such a view excludes prominent Companions who only stayed with him for a short period of time, like Wā’il ibn Ḥujr and Malik ibn al-Huwayrith (Ibid.). Another possible exception is Sa‘īd ibn Musayyab. He refuses to define Companions in such a general state as most of the scholars have. He argues that a Šaḥābī is one who stayed with the Prophet for at least two years, and participated in at least one battle with him (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 211). Finally, there is al-Wāqidī (d. 207/822-3), who only considered those who reached adulthood during the lifetime of the Prophet to be Companions (Brown 2009, 87).

The argument I have presented above has at least been touched upon in the Nuzhah, but it has certainly not been critically assessed. The guidelines set down for who is considered a Companion in the Nuzhah are very loose and far-ranging. A Muslim can be deemed a Šaḥābī if he saw the Prophet just once, even unintentionally and without any conversation of any form. In other words, all of them enjoy this nobility of the title of Companion, regardless of the extent of his/her interaction with the Prophet.

189 Ibn al-Šalāḥ writes that this definition is more likely to be according to the legal theorists, rather than the ḥadīth masters. If Sa‘īd’s opinion is accepted, then Jarīr ibn ‘Abd Allāh would not be classified as a Companion (1986, 293).
Yet he also intricately points out that the status of a Companion who stayed with the Prophet for a considerable length of time and fought alongside him in battles is clearly greater than those Companions who only momentarily met him, despite the fact all are labelled as ‘Companions.’ This duality is accepted therefore by Ibn Ḥajar in some form. Hence a balance is required; this is only realistically possible when we view the Companions differently, according to their religious rank on the one hand and according to their ability to fully fathom the Prophet’s words and accurately pass it on to others on the other.

Perhaps owing to the sensitivity of the issue, some scholars, including Ibn Ḥajar, have chosen to imply that the theological status of the Companions automatically vouches for their academic ability too. After all, no Muslim would want to be smeared with the charge of questioning the rank of the Companions in any form. In the ninth Islamic century, Abū Zur‘a al-Rāzī stated that anyone who criticised a Companion was a heretic (Brown 2009, 87), clearly indicating that questioning their rank was off-limit. More recently, Mawdūḍī wrote that ‘even the noble Companions were overcome by human weakness, one attacking another.’ This comment led to a barrage of criticism from his Muslim contemporaries who saw the remarks as nothing short of slanderous (Brown 1999, pp.86-87).

The protectiveness enjoyed by the Companions and the sensitivity surrounding criticising them has affected the nature of the debate regarding the Companions. Rather than dealing with these sensitive issues, the Muslim scholars opt for the less controversial ones in their analysis and commentaries. A prime example of this is the dispute as to whether someone is considered as a Companion if he saw the Prophet after his demise before he was buried. Mīghālwi and al-Munāwī are of the opinion that such people will not be considered as Companions.\textsuperscript{190} Another example is the dispute as to whether small infants who the Prophet saw are considered as Companions.\textsuperscript{191} Ibn Ḥajar does exactly the same here in the \textit{Nuzhah} when he touches upon whether Bahīra the monk was a Companion or not. Muslim scholars are content to analyse such discussions because it is not blasphemous in any way. On the other hand, separating the religious and academic rank of the Companions is controversial at the very least, if not blasphemous.

If Muslims are not willing to hear criticism about the Companions from Muslims, it is obvious that they will not desire to hear it from non-Muslims. A few examples of their constructive remarks are mentioned below:

a. Brown has suggested that even the Prophet did not ‘completely trust all those who could be called Companions’ (1999, 85). After quoting the famous ḥadīth in which the Prophet said: ‘Let whoever tells lies about me deliberately take his place in hell’, he concludes that:

...this can be taken to mean that Muḥammad knew that there were those among his Companions who were spreading lies about him (1999, 85). 192

b. Brown also notes that there were ‘reports of conflicts and mutual accusations among the Companions’ (1999, 86).

c. In fact, Brown suggests, the Companions were marked by mistrust and dispute to the extent that ‘Umar felt the need to confine three Companions to Madina to keep them spreading traditions (Ibid.).

In response to such remarks, Muslim scholars have felt the urgent need to mute such voices, precisely because it questions the most dedicated men of Islam.

Over sixty Companions narrated ‘Let whoever tells lies about me deliberately take his place in hell’ from the Prophet, including those figures whom the Prophet promised a 192 Brown’s opinion clearly shows the wide discrepancy of western scholars on this tradition (Let whoever tells lies about me...). By suggesting that the Prophet did say these words to his Companions, he implicitly suggests that there is some authenticity to the report. This is in stark contrast to other western academics who strongly assert that the hadith is forged. Guillaume, for example, writes, ‘A most remarkable feature of the reaction [of increased forgery] was that the theologians borrowed the weapons of the liars. In order to combat false traditions they invented others equally destitute of prophetic authority. An extra ordinary number of Companions are cited as witnesses that the Prophet said, ‘whoever shall repeat of me that which I have not said, his resting place shall be in Hell’ (1924, pp.78-79)

Several points must be raised with regards to Brown’s objection;
Firstly, the logic of his reasoning is not conclusive. Merely because the Prophet warned of lying against him does not automatically mean that the Companions were lying. Instead, the saying can be seen as a reminder to those around him that his words are to be reported with utmost accuracy and integrity. If x warns y to refrain from lying, it does not necessitate that y is already indulging in lying; it could mean that x is asking y to refrain from lying as he has done in the past.
Secondly, the hadith itself, as classical scholars agree, is not directed at the Companions but at the generations thereafter. In other words, the saying is a prophecy of what will occur after the Companions’ times. Several traditions exist which do not address the Companions but those who come after them. For example, the Prophet was reported to have said: ‘Do not insult my Companions. For I swear by Allāh, if you were to spend the weight of Mount Uhud in gold [in Allāh’s path], you would not even reach their sight, nor half of it’ (al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī 1998, 48). Clearly, this is directed to those after the Companions. The hadith warning against lying against the Prophet is to be interpreted in the same light.
place in paradise during their lifetime. It seems illogical – to say the least – that for the same group of people, the Prophet would be promising a place in Paradise, as well as warning them of entering into Hell-Fire.

Without doubt, the Muslims admit that conflicts did arise between the Companions, but the nature of these disputes has been misinterpreted by certain observers. More often than not, the dispute centred on which traditions were to be acted upon and which would not, in terms of abrogation for example. The nature of the disputes was not because the Companions did not trust one another in terms of their character, honesty and ability to accurately transmit what they had heard from the Prophet. The supposed report alleges that ‘Umar confined the three Companions because they narrated too many traditions. But the three Companions in question were not known for their excessive narration. Ibn Mas‘ūd narrated 848 traditions, Abū al-Dardā’ narrated 179 and Abū Dharr narrated 281. (Ṣiddīqī 1993, 18) As Pīr Muhammad Karam Shah asks, why did ‘Umar not confine Abū Hurayra (5374 reported traditions), Ibn ‘Abbās (1660 traditions) or his own son ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Umar (2630 traditions)? (1973, 114) There are at least twenty-one Companions who narrated more traditions than Abū al-Dardā’, but ‘Umar did not take any action against them.

193 For instance, the Ḥanafī Jurist al-Shāshī (d. 335/946) cites the dispute that occurred between Abū Hurayra and Anas as to whether it was necessary to perform ablution again after eating cooked meat. Conflicting traditions exist on the matter; some state that ablution must be performed whereas others state it is not necessary. The dispute between the two Companions on the matter was with regards to which tradition had been abrogated. It was not because they questioned the authenticity of each others’ narration.

194 The actual narration which supposedly claims that ‘Umar prevented three Companions from narrating traditions is very weak. Abū Shuhba quotes Ibn Ḥazm who has shown the report has a discontinuous chain. According to his investigations, Ibrāhīm ibn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān ibn ‘Awf could not have heard from ‘Umar. This is because Ibrāhīm died in either 95/713 or 99/717, at the age of seventy-five. He was born in either 20/640 or 24/644, at the end of the caliphate of ‘Umar. Hence, according to the dates of each, Ibrāhīm was only three years old when ‘Umar died, an age at which it would have been impossible to hear and transmit narrations (Abū Shuhba 1996, 280, al-Sībā’ī 1998, 83).
5.41.1. Conclusion.

This section on the Companions reflects the polemics that marks the study of ʿilm al-ḥadīth. The Muslims dare not question the integrity of these servants of Muḥammad whilst the western scholars highlight the tension and accuracy that existed between them. The truth – it seems – lies in between these two spectrums. The Companions were religiously credible but not necessarily academically equal, as my analysis has shown. Like with many other sections in the Nuzhah, it highlights the protectionism that certain individuals and groups hold. Muslims cannot and should not question the rank of the Companions, even if the result of its absence is a blurred understanding ʿilm al-ḥadīth.

5.42. Al-Tābiʿī and al-Mukhaḍramūn.

[The isnād either ends at the Prophet, at the Companion (Ṣaḥābī)] or at the Tābiʿī (Successor). The Tābiʿī is the is one who met the Companion(s) with the same detail as before (as a believer in the Prophet, and then died as a Muslim), except the condition of faith in the Companion, as this is specific to the Prophet only. This is the chosen opinion, as opposed to those [scholars] who add the condition of extensive adherence for the Successor [to the Companion], the validity of hearing from him or the condition of acknowledgement.

There lies between the Companions and the Successors a group upon which there is a dispute regarding which of the two [aforementioned] categories they belong to. These are the Mukhaḍramūn, who lived through the period of Ignorance and the period of Islam, but did not see the Prophet. Thus Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr has [seemingly] classified these as Companions and ‘Iyād] and others have claimed that Ibn ‘Abd al-Barr has explicitly said such. In this opinion lies doubt, because Ibn ‘Abd al-Barr clarified in the introduction of his book that he included the mentioning of the Mukhadramūn so that it could entail all those who lived in the first generation. The correct opinion is that they are classified as the senior Successors, irrespective of whether it is known one of them became a Muslim in the time of the Prophet — like al-Najashi 195 — or not.

However, if it is proven that the all of the people of the earth were unveiled to the Prophet on the Night of Ascension and he observed them all, then the Mukhadramūn should be classified as among those who believed in him during his lifetime, even if he did not meet them as [conventional] Companions, since the seeing has been achieved by the Prophet. 196

195 He was the king of Abyssinia, who became a Muslim in the time of the Prophet. When he died, the Prophet described him as a ‘pious man’ (al-‘Uthaymin 2002, pp. 285-6).
196 Ibn Ḥajar himself is inclined to the opinion that the Mukhadramūn are deemed as senior Successors rather than Companions. He does however raise an interesting point which could suggest that they are in fact Companions. Muslims believe that on the Night of Ascension, the Prophet saw the entire people of the world. As previously mentioned in the definition of a Companion, it does not matter if the Prophet saw the person in question and not vice versa; he will still be considered as a Companion. On this basis, the Mukhadramūn should be classified as Companions. Al-Wajīdī believes this is insufficient evidence to classify them as Companions. On the night of Ascension, the Prophet observed all the people of the earth in the ʿālam ghayb (the unseen realm), whereas the matter here pertains to the ʿālam shuhūd (the visible realm) (al-Wajīdī 1996, 178). Additionally, al-‘Uthaymin writes that if such a line of argument is maintained, then all the previous prophets and messengers too should be classified as ‘Companions’, because the Prophet met (and conversed with many of them) them too on this night (2002, 289). But of course, no scholar adheres to such an opinion.
5.42.1. The Successors.

Ibn Ḣajar effectively defines the Successors (Tābiʿī) in relation to the Companions. In the same manner a Companion is defined as someone who met the Prophet as a Muslim and then died in such a state, a Successor is one who met one of the Companions as a Muslim and died as a Muslim. As Ibn Ḣajar highlights, the part which is not applicable to the Successors is actually ‘believing’ in the Companion, as this is only a requirement for the Prophet.

In the previous section, it was shown that Muslims have dealt with the issue of Companions with great sensitivity, lest it insult the closest men to the Prophet. This section from Ibn Ḣajar too suggests a similar theme, albeit in a different manner.

When outlining his definition of a Companion, Ibn Ḣajar’s is cautious not to exclude anyone; if a person even saw the Prophet from afar, he is still considered a Ṣahābī. The likes of Saʿīd ibn Musayyab – it was noted – suggest that a person has to have extensive companionship with the Prophet before he is deemed a Ṣahābī. Ibn Ḣajar in the Nuzhah steered clear from any condition as such.

However, in this section, the Nuzhah offers the definition of a Tābiʿī and then does mention how some scholars add ‘the condition of extensive adherence for the Successor [to the Companion], the validity of hearing from him or the condition of acknowledgement’. He does at least entertain such conditions, even though he does not agree with them.

What is the reason behind this difference? Because adding such conditions to the definition of a Companion may exclude certain individuals as being a Ṣahābī, which is quite a sensitive exercise. That sensitivity does not exist with the Successors and therefore there is nothing wrong with suggesting that a Tābi‘ī needs to have extensive companionship in order to have this title.

This interpretation reflects a theme that we have noted before in the Nuzhah; that certain groups and individuals are protected in the discipline. For Ibn Ḥajar, we can question the conditions surrounding the definition of a Tābi‘ī. But for the Companions, such discussions are off-limit.

5.42.2. The Mukhadrāmūn.

This term refers to the Muslims who lived in the time of Ignorance and Islam, but did not meet the Prophet. There is a dispute amongst the scholars regarding whether they are classified as Companions or Successors. The word derives from the Arabic ‘khadrāma’ to mean ‘cut off’ (al-‘Uthaymin 2002, 285). They are so-called because they were cut-off from the Muslims who resided with the Prophet.

197 The time of Ignorance (jāhiliyya) refers to the period prior to the Prophet. A minority opinion is that it is the time before the Conquest of Makka.

198 Al-Suyūṭī writes that the root word can also mean ‘confused.’ The Arabs say lahm mukhadrām to describe meat when it is not known whether it derived from a male or female animal. (1972, 2: 238).
It has already been observed how the Nuzhah acts an arbitrator between disputed technical terms in the discipline. Here in this section is an example of how Ibn Ḥajar helps us to overcome misunderstandings that have existed between Muslim scholars. In his biographical account of all the Companions *al-Istīʿāb fī asmāʾ al-ashāb*¹⁹⁹, Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr did include the biographies of the Mukhadramūn. Al-Qāḍī ʿIyāḍ used this to suggest that he considers them as Companions. But Ibn Ḥajar believes that Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr included them in his account so that his works could comprehensively cover all those who lived in the first generation, not necessarily because he firmly believes they are technically classified as Companions.

5.43. Marfūʿ, mawqūf, maqṭūʿ and athar.

Thus the first type – in what has passed from the three types – and that is where the end of the isnād concludes at the Prophet , is called marfūʿ, irrespective of whether that is with a continuous isnād or not. The second is mawqūf; and that is what ends at the Companion. And the third is maqṭūʿ: and that is what ends at the Successor and those beneath the Successors, namely the Followers of the Successors (atbāʾ al-ṭābiʿīn) and those after them. It is equal in terms of naming it maqṭūʿ, namely that which is from the Successor and that which is from those after them. And if you like, you can say: ‘[the report is] mawqūf to such and such.’

So there is a difference in terminology between maqṭūʿ and munqaṭīʿ: the latter relates to the isnād, like it has already been mentioned, and the former relates to the ¹⁹⁹ The Comprehensive, in the name of the Companions.

\textit{matn}, as you can see. Some [scholars] have placed one in the place of the other, contrary to the [correct] terminological use. And the last two, namely \textit{mawqūf} and \textit{maqṭū‘} are [also] called \textit{athar}.

In this short section, the author summarises the previous discussion on the Companions and the Successors by highlighting what a report narrated by their likes are called in ḥadīth terminology. Variations do exist on the above definitions. For example, Abū Bakr ibn Thābit defines \textit{marfū‘} as that report in which the Companion informs of a saying, action or silent approval of the Prophet (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986. 45). On this basis, he does not consider a \textit{mursal} report as \textit{marfū‘}.

Owing to the fact that both derive from the same root word, Ibn Ḥajar reminds the reader that there is a clear difference between \textit{maqṭū‘} and \textit{munqaṭī‘}. \textit{Maqṭū‘} is used to describe the actual text, in that it stems from the Successors or those after them. \textit{Munqaṭī‘} on the other hand refers to a report which has a discontinuation in the isnād. This is the renowned definition for both, though the author does acknowledge that some scholars have inverted the two. It seems that it is the earlier scholars who have deviated from the definition offered by Ibn Ḥajar, such as al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 47). This is somewhat excused, because they lived at a time when the terminology of ‘\textit{ilm al-ḥadīth}’ was still in its infant stage. Such discussions on the technical terms and their usage display why the \textit{Nuzhah} is an ideal guide for disciples embarking on prophetic studies for the first time.
5.44. Musnad.

The musnad – in the saying of the ḥadīth master ‘This is a musnad ḥadīth’ – is a marfū‘ [through the means of the] Companion with a chain that it is visibly continuous [leading to the Prophet]. Thus my saying ‘marfū‘’ is like a jins and my saying ‘[through the means of the] Companion’ is the faṣl that excludes that which the Successor raises [to the Prophet]. That [will be declared as a report which] is mursal and [if the report is raised by] someone below the Successor, then that is mu‘dīl or mu‘allaq. My saying ‘visibly continuous’ excludes that which apparently looks discontinuous, and includes that report which seemingly looks continuous. Clearly, that which is in reality continuous [though looks otherwise] will also be included in musnad. It becomes apparent from the condition of ‘visibly looking continuous’ that a hidden discontinuation – like the ‘an’ana from a mudallis and the contemporary for whom the meeting [with his shaykh] has not been proven – does not exclude a report from being musnad, by virtue of the fact that the imāms [of ḥadīth] have recorded musnads upon this form.

This definition complies with the saying of al-Ḥākim [when he writes]: ‘The musnad is that which a ḥadīth master reports from his shaykh in which he seemingly heard from him, and likewise so has his shaykh from his shaykh, continuous to the Companion and to the Prophet ☪.’

As for al-Khaṭīb [al-Baghdādī], [he says that the] musnad is continuous. For this reason, then the mawqūf, when it is reported with a continuous chain, is called musnad according to him. However, he says that this [terminology] is used rarely.
Far-fetched is the remark of Ibn ‘Abd al-Barr when he said: ‘The musnad is the marfū’ with no consideration for the continuity of the isnād. This definition then will also befit the mursal, the mu‘qīl and the munqatī’, when the text (matn) is raised [to the Prophet]. There is no one [else] of this opinion.

Commentary

In essence, the musnad is the term which refers to a perfect ḥadīth. What this means is that the ḥadīth is marked by the following attributes:

• The isnād leads to the matn that expresses the sayings, actions or silent approvals of the Prophet. In other words, it is marfū’.

• The Companion reports the saying or action of the Prophet in the musnad report. This therefore excludes mursal, in which the reporter after the Successor (which is usually the Companion) is missing (al-‘Uthaymin 2002, 296).

• There are no visible breaks in the isnād. This means that it cannot be mursal, mu‘qīl or munqatī’. However, by saying ‘visible’, it means that the isnād can have an invisible break in the isnād. On this basis, the term musnad can still be employed to describe a ḥadīth that is mu‘an‘an, mudallas or mursal khafī. As proof for this opinion, Ibn Ḥajar reminds the reader that such reports are included in the works of the ḥadīth masters and are still declared as musnads. Also, the definition offered by al-Ḥākim lends firm support to Ibn Ḥajar’s definition.
5.44.1. Other definitions for musnad.

Ibn Ḥajar’s task in the Nuzhah was to offer a brief overview of the discipline and inform the reader of the different names and terms used in the discipline. This section shows that he also felt it important to highlight the ikhtilāf that exists too, when he included the definition of musnad according to other scholars. The importance of ikhtilāf in the Nuzhah will be referred to in detail in chapter six. For now, we can see how he refers to musnad according to the understanding of others:

1. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī writes that a musnad report is that which is continuous even if it falls short of the Prophet (1988, 58). However, he admits that this usage for the term is rare.

2. Ibn ‘Abd al-Barr holds musnad to be synonymous with marfū’ in al-Tamhīd (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 43). Ibn Ḥajar’s remarks suggest that his definition is wholly contrary to general usage and more far-fetched than al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī’s variation. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ does acknowledge that this is not the only definition offered by Ibn ‘Abd al-Barr. In another variation, he adheres to the definition offered by Ibn Ḥajar (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 43).

5.45. ‘Uluww - The Elevated.

If the numbers are less – namely the numbers of the people of the isnād – then either it ends at the Prophet with that small number, in comparison to the another isnād for that same ḥadīth that has more numbers; or either it ends to a highly-attributed imām from the imāms of hadīth, such as [attributes of] memorisation, accuracy, literary works and so on from the demanded attributes for the sake of preference, like Shu‘ba, and Mālik, al-Thawrī, al-Shāfi‘ī, al-Bukhārī, Muslim and other [highly-decorated] imāms. Thus the first type, and that is what ends at the Prophet ﷺ, is ‘uluww muṭlaq.

If coincidentally the shorter isnād is sound, that will be the most desired [matter]. If it is not, then the form of ‘uluww is still present in it, so long as it is not forged; for this is synonymous to non-existence. 200

The second [type], is ‘uluww nisbī. This is where the numbers are less leading to that imām, even if the number from that imām to the end of the chain is numerous. Certainly, the efforts of the earlier reporters have been great in seeking the elevation (‘uluww) to the extent that this has deviated them from more pressing matters. This elevation is [dearly] sought because it is closer to authenticity and nearer to fewer mistakes. This is because there is not a reporter in an isnād except the possibility of error exists for him. As the means increase and the isnād extends, then the possibility of errors greatens. As this decreases, so do the chances of errors. If a distinction exists in the non-elevated isnād that is not to be found in the elevated isnād – like the men of the isnād are more authoritative, or more outstanding in memorisation or more learned in jurisprudence, or that the continuation is more apparent – then there is no hesitation in deeming the non-elevated isnād as better. 201

200 In other words, a shorter chain for a report that is forged is of no significance whatsoever.
201 Ibn Ḥajar is quick to point out that this is the general rule and not the universal one. There may be cases where despite the existence of a shorter isnād for a particular report, the longer may still be preferred. For instance, the latter may consist of more reliable and authoritative reporters than the shorter one. The words of delivery employed may suggest more accuracy in the longer chain (al-‘Uthaymin 2002, 303). In such cases, the shorter isnād is still deemed as isnād ‘āli (the elevated chain), but the longer one will be preferred. Based on this principle, al-‘Uthaymin writes that there are two types of ‘uluww; in terms of
As for those people who prefer the non-elevated in general because the extensive analysis demands more hardship which subsequently results in more reward, then this is showing preference owing to an alien matter, not linked to the soundness and weakness of a ḥadīth.

Commentary

Continuing his discussion specifically on the isnād, Ibn Ḥajar introduces the term ‘uluww, which means ‘elevated’. When a ḥadīth specialist possesses an isnād for a report, then it is desirable for him to seek elevation for it. This means he seeks means by which he can shorten the chain, and thus minimise the chances of error. Al-‘Uthaymin explains:

For instance, a reporter possesses a ḥadīth in which there are two men between himself and al-Imām Mālik. The reporter would then go to the furthest land to ensure no reporter remained between himself and Mālik, by hearing the reporter directly from him (2002, 302).

Ibn Ḥajar states the obvious when he indicates why the elevated chain is a matter which carries great importance. If the isnād consists of five narrators, then the chance for error attributes (ṣifat) and in terms of number. The former is where the narrators are marked by more accuracy and a higher degree of memorization and integrity. The latter is simply where there are less reporters in the chain compared to another (2002, 302).

202 A minority opinion exists from some scholars suggesting that the low isnād is better. Perhaps Ibn Ḥajar implies the opinion of Ibn Khalūd, who argued that the non-elevated chain is better (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 264). This is on the basis that more narrators in a chain requires more analysis and investigation, which thus results in more religious reward. Ibn Ḥajar dismisses this opinion by saying that reward lies in differentiating the sound from the weak, not in investigation and analysis per se. And if seeking an elevated chain leads to more authenticity then there is no reason why a non-elevated chain should be accepted. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ voices the same sentiment when he writes: ‘Indeed, we heard ‘Alī ibn al-Madīnī and Abū ‘Amr al-Mustamī al-Nisābūrī say, ‘Lowness (in chains) is a calamity’ (1986, 264).
is much greater in an isnād for the same report that only contains three narrators. The shorter the chain, then the less room for error. Here is an implicit indication from Ibn Ḥajar that the discipline depends on men and can therefore never be totally soundproof: reporters of even the highest calibre can make mistakes. The decreased chance of error is the simple reason why ḥadīth specialists occupied their time with seeking elevation over other matters.

But was the purpose of seeking elevation purely for the sake of increased authenticity? Seemingly not. This is shown implicitly in two parts of the Nuzhah. Firstly, Ibn Ḥajar writes that the elevation can be of two types. The first is called ‘uluww muṭlaq and is marked by an attempt to shorten a report that leads to the Prophet. The second, ‘uluww nisbī, is where the disciple attempts to shorten the isnād that leads to a renowned ḥadīth master, irrespective if the isnād thereafter (namely, from that imām to the Prophet) is long (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 257). The existence of ‘uluww nisbī suggests the idea that prestige is more important than authenticity. This is because it leads to a closeness not to the Prophet, but to one of these celebrated men of ḥadīth ‘like Shu’ba, and Mālik, al-Thawrī, al-Shāfi‘i, al-Bukhārī, Muslim and other [highly-decorated] imāms.’

The second part where Ibn Ḥajar suggests that seeking an elevated isnād had a function other than ḥadīth authenticity is where he notes that ‘certainly, the efforts of the earlier reporters have been great in seeking the elevation (‘uluww) to the extent that this has deviated them from more pressing matters.’ The ‘pressing matters’ Ibn Ḥajar is referring to here is ḥadīth authenticity. But he acknowledges that past Muslims sometimes saw the elevated isnād as the goal, not the means. This makes sense when we remember that the isnād also provided a connection to the Prophet and established a person as part of the Muslim scholarly class. As a result, one’s proximity to the Prophet in the isnād and access to reports that other scholars lacked served as marks of precedence in the scholarly community (Brown 2009, 47). Owing to this prestige, seeking an elevated isnād became a goal in its own right, rather than the goal of ḥadīth authenticity. Brown observes:

As in any society, Muslim religious scholars and pious individuals established a system of honors and valuable items that individuals could earn or attain; like educational degrees. Muslim scholars sought out shorter and shorter isnāds, rarer and rarer ḥadīths, as a way to gain precedence, fame and respect in their religious culture (2009, 47).

A prime example of someone who gave preference to elevated chains rather than ḥadīth authenticity was al-Ṭabarānī (d. 360/971) in his three Muʿjams. Some of the isnāds he mentioned were unbelievably short, calling into question what the aim of his work actually was. Whereas al-Bukhārī only included twenty-eight instances that contained three men in the chain, a hundred years later al-Ṭabarānī regularly included chains with four men (Brown 2009, 48). His entire intention is further questioned when we observe that after each ḥadīth, he would add a comment on how rare the report is, not how authentic it was.

The desire for a direct link to the Prophet and the absurdity surrounding this quest is perhaps best epitomised by al-Zabīdī (d. 1791). He claimed to have heard a ḥadīth via an isnād of two jinns (supernatural beings) from the Prophet (Brown 2009, 48).
This section suggests that not all Muslims that occupied themselves in ḥadīth studies were doing so for religious reasons. For some, it was a social pastime and a means of gaining status in society. This was also the reality in Mamluk Cairo too, as we shall explain in section six.

5.46. Muwāfaqa & badal- the Agreements and Substitutions.

In it – namely ‘uluww nisbī – is muwāfaqa. This is reaching one of the shaykhs of compilations\(^{203}\) through another [independent] means, namely the path that leads to that specific compiler. Its example is that al-Bukhārī has reported a ḥadīth from Qutayba from Mālik. If we narrate it through his means then there will be eight [reporters] between him and Qutayba. And if we report that same ḥadīth through the means of Abū al-‘Abbās al-Sarrāj, from Qutayba, for example, then there will be seven [reporters] between him and Qutayba. So muwāfaqa has been achieved with al-Bukhārī with his own shaykh, along with the elevated isnād to it.

Also in it – namely ‘uluww nisbī – is badal. This is reaching the shaykh of his shaykh in a similar fashion. An example is the same isnād through another means to Qa‘nabī, from Mālik. Thus Qa‘nabī will be in the substitute place for Qutayba.

\(^{203}\) This means the compilers of the six canonical compilations.
[The terms] muwāfaqa and badal are mostly applied when it couples with elevation (‘uluww). If it does not occur with elevation, then the term muwāfaqa and badal is still applied, [even] in the absence of elevation.\(^\text{204}\)

Commentary

The introduction of the terms muwāfaqa and badal is directly related to the previous section where ‘uluww nisbī was outlined. Ibn Ḥajar here gives a practical example to show how the terms are used. In this brief paragraph, one cannot ignore the fact that the terms muwāfaqa and badal are very similar (badal is like muwāfaqa, except that the elevation has been attained to the shaykh of the shaykh). The ḥadīth scholars’ introduction of such terms served to show the exactness of the discipline.

Additionally, no indication is given here as to how shortening the chain to a celebrated imām adds to the authenticity of a report. Elevation is not a condition for saḥīḥ. This adds to the suspicion – as highlighted in the previous section – that seeking an elevated isnād (‘uluww nisbī) had a prestige attached to it which Muslims sought to gain.

\(^{204}\) Ibn Ḥajar notes that these two terms are usually applied when the process leads to an elevated chain. In other words, muwāfaqa and badal should be sought along with the intention of minimising the number of reporters in the chain. If the elevation is not attained during this process, then the scholars do still refer to it with these terms.
5.47. Musāwāh & muşafaḥa- the Equivalent and the Hand-Shaking.

In it – namely ‘uluww nisbī – is musāwāh. This is equalling the number in the isnād from the reporter to its end, namely in the isnād of ‘uluww nisbī, with the isnād of one of the compilers. Like for example, [al-Imām] al-Nasā’ī reports a ḥadīth in which between him and the Prophetﷺ are eleven people. The same ḥadīth with another isnād has come across us in which there are eleven people between us and the Prophetﷺ. Hence we have equalled al-Nasā’ī in terms of number, in exclusion to that specific isnād of al-Nasā’ī’s.

Also in it – namely ‘uluww nisbī – is muşafaḥa. This is the equalling with the disciple of that compiler in the aforementioned form. It is called muşafaḥa because it is usually a habit for two people to handshake when they meet. And we in this form have almost met al-Nasā’ī; thus it is as if we have shook hands.

The opposite of ‘uluww with its aforementioned types is nuzūl. So each type of ‘uluww has an opposite form from nuzūl, as opposed to those who assume that ‘uluww does not have its contrasting type in nuzūl.

Commentary

In theory, ‘uluww muṭlaq is of greater importance for the authenticity of a ḥadīth than ‘uluww nisbī. This is because the former is an attempt to shorten the isnād to the Prophet whereas the former is an attempt to shorten it to a renowned ḥadīth master. In portrayal, it seems ‘uluww nisbī is more important for Ibn Ḥajar. Four additional terms have been introduced related to ‘uluww nisbī – muwāfaqa, badal, musāwāh and musāfaḥa along with practical examples to show how they work. In contrast, none of these four terms relate to ‘uluww mutlaq. This is an indication that the isnād was not merely a connection to the Prophet, but membership to a scholarly elite. Additionally, it is a clue into how the technical terms in the discipline were used. The terms were not just to define and differentiate different types of prophetic reports. The terms also gave an indirect insight into what scholars saw as more important in the field. Here, the fact that ‘uluww mutlaq have no related terms and that ‘uluww nisbī have four suggests that a connection to a renowned scholar was of greater importance than to the Prophet, perhaps more so in the ninth Islamic century.

205 In contrast to the ‘uluww is the nuzūl, or ‘low’. When referring to the actual isnād, the scholars apply the term al-‘isnād al-‘ālī (the elevated chain) and the al-‘isnād al-nāzīl (the low chain).

5.48. Aqrān- the Contemporaries.

If the narrator shares similarities with the one he reported from in a matter from the matters pertaining to narration, such as age or taking reports from the same shaykhs, then this a type which is called the narration of the aqrān, so called because the narrator is of his like. Thus when each one from the contemporaries report from the other, then this is mudabbaj – this is more specific than the first as every mudabbaj is aqrān and not every aqrān is mudabbaj.

Verily al-Dāraquṭnī has compiled [a book] on the latter 206, and Abū al-Shaykh al-Iṣbahānī has compiled [a book] on the former. 207

206 This book is called al-Mudabbaj.
207 This book is called Riwāyat al-aqrān.
When the shaykh reports from his disciple, it is true that each one has [now] reported from the other. So is it called mudabbaj? In this is a debate. Apparently, it is not [called mudabbaj] because it is [considered as] the reporting of the seniors from the juniors. Tadbīj is derived from the dībāja (cheeks) of the face. So this suggests that each one should be equal on both sides. So it does not appear as such [with the case of the shaykh taking from the student].

Aqrān and mudabbaj in essence is where similarities are to be found between two narrators. As the Nuzhah indicates, this similarity can take on different forms. For instance, they both can be of approximate similar age, which is then deemed as aqrān. Likewise, the two can be similar in terms of the fact that both have often relied on one particular shaykh.

At first it may seem that mudabbaj and aqrān are not directly related to the field of ‘ilm al-hadīth and are merely an academic exercise of little worth. However, Muslim scholars state there are cases where knowing the two can help us to differentiate the authentic report from the non-authentic. Al-‘Uthaymin explains:

> Sometimes, a disciple forgets a ḥadīth that he took from his shaykh. His contemporary may have better memory than him who has not forgotten the ḥadīth.

208 Mudabbaj is where similarities are to be found between the two reporters and it is known that they have reported from another. There is a dispute amongst the scholars as to whether the term mudabbaj is applied when a shaykh reports from his disciple. Ibn Ḥajar believes that this comes under the reporting of the senior from the junior, rather than mudabbaj. He argues from a linguistic perspective. Because the word mudabbaj derives from dībāja which means cheeks, then when a shaykh takes from the disciple, this should not be referred to as mudabbaj, because they are not equal in terms of narrating from another, just like the cheeks of the face are. In terms of rank, the shaykh is clearly greater than the disciple (in most cases) and so the exact similarity has not been achieved. The narrations in the form of mudabbaj include the reporting of Abū Hurayra from ‘Āʾishah and vice versa, the reporting of al-Zuhrī from ‘Umar ibn ‘Abd al-Azīz and vice versa and the reporting of Mālik from al-Awzā‘ī and vice versa (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 309).
So the disciple can take the ḥadīth from the contemporary, who has heard it from the shaykh (2002, 312).

Moreover, when two contemporaries feature in the isnād, one after the other, then this can give us assurance that they are not an addition in the isnād, but rather have actually narrated from one another (Ṭahḥān 2001, 151). Also, knowing the mudabbaj and aqrān can help us overcome difficulties in writings. If two narrators are mentioned in an isnād and it is not known whether the report says ‘from’ (‘an) or ‘and’ (wa) in between them, then information gained regarding the mudabbaj and aqrān can help us solve this dilemma.

On a final note, the section here indicates the type of debate that existed in Ibn Ḥajar’s time surrounding ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. One gets the impression that a radical overhaul of the discipline or a serious critical evaluation of it was not on the agenda during the ninth Islamic century. Rather, there were minor concerns like whether the shaykh reporting from his disciple is termed mudabbaj or riwāyat al-akābir ‘an al-aṣāghir.

5.49. Riwāyat al-akābir ‘an al-aṣāghir- the Narration of the Seniors from the Juniors.

If the reporter narrates from someone who is less than him in age, or in terms of [frequency of] meeting or in terms of rank, then this type is the narration of the 209 When this happens, it is called Ziyādat al-ruwāt.

210 This was the case with al-Zuhrī and Yahyā ibn Sa’īd al-Anṣārī with Mālik (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 307).
211 For example, a disciple takes a ḥadīth from someone who has stayed with his shaykh for two years, though he himself has spent twenty years with the same shaykh (al-‘Uthaymin 2002, 313).
seniors from the juniors. This [application of the term] includes narration of the fathers from the sons, the Companions from the Successors, the shaykh from his disciple and its likes. The opposite of [these forms] is common because this is the overwhelming form of narration. The benefit of this is differentiation between the different ranks and putting people in their place. Verily al-Khaṭīb [al-Baghdādī] has written a book on the narration of the fathers from the sons and has dedicated a beautiful treatise on the narration of the Companions from the Successors.

Commentary

Ibn Ḥajar here refers to the area in 'ilm al-ḥadīth known as the narration of the seniors from the juniors. This can take many forms, as highlighted in the Nuzhah.

One of the benefits of this identification is to prevent a person from assuming the isnād has been swapped (qalb). Al-ʻUthaymin explains:

213 For example, al-ʻAbbās ibn ʻAbd al-Muṭṭalib took a ḥadīth from his son al-ʻAqīl regarding the combining of two Prayers at al-Muzdalīfa (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 313; al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 254).

214 For instance, the ʻAbd Allāhs and other Companions took from Kaʻb al-Ahbar (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 308). Al-Suyūṭī notes that prophetic reports were narrated by the Companions from the Successors, and not just biblical and mawqif reports (1972, 2: 388).

Note: The ʻIbādalāh refers to anyone whose name was ʻAbd Allāh from the Companions, which are approximately two hundred and twenty in number (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 220). However, specifically it refers to four prominent Companions who were called ʻAbd Allāh. According to Ahmad ibn Ḥanbal they are; (i) ʻAbd Allāh ibn ʻUmar (ii) ʻAbd Allāh ibn ʻAbbās (iii) ʻAbd Allāh ibn al-Zubayr (iv) ʻAbd Allāh ibn ʻAmr ibn al-ʻAṣ. These four are prominent and famous because they passed away late and thus diffused knowledge to the Muslims (Taḥḥān 2001, 155). ʻAbd Allāh Ibn Masʻūd does not feature under this classification because he passed away relatively quickly (Mīghālwi 2003, 528; al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 219). Other scholars have different opinions regarding the ʻIbādalāh. Al-Imām Jawharī confined the ʻIbādalāh to three, omitting ʻAbd Allāh ibn al-Zubayr. Al-Nawawī classified ʻAbd Allāh Ibn Masʻūd as one of the four in the place of ʻAbd Allāh ibn ʻAmr ibn al-ʻAṣ (Mīghālwi 2003, 529).

215 In other words, cases where the junior narrates from the senior, the Successor narrates from the Companion and the son narrates from the father are common-practice and the normal, expected mode of reporting (al-ʻUthaymin 2002, 314).

216 The name of this treatise is Riwāyat al-ʻĀbā’ ‘an al-Abnā’.
When a narrator reports a ḥadīth and finds a narration of a father from the son, then what will he initially think? He will assume that it has been swapped, because normally the son narrates from the father (2002, 314).

A detailed list of people who have reported from their sons can help us to differentiate the swapped reports from the un-swapped ones.

The other benefit, as Ibn Ḥajar notes, is to ‘put people in their place’. What this means is that people do not automatically and arrogantly assume their elevated rank because they are the more senior in narration. Rank stems from integrity and accuracy in the discipline of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth rather than from age and academic rank. Ibn al-Šalāḥ reflects this opinion when he writes:

It has been established that ‘Ā’isha said: ‘The Messenger of Allāh ﷺ ordered us to put people in their proper place’ (1986, 307).

So in this short section, Ibn Ḥajar is making two statements, an academic one and a religious one. The academic one is that the men in the chain took on all different forms, with fathers sometimes reporting from their sons and the seniors narrating from the juniors. Ibn Ḥajar is suggesting that this could only come about if the chains were genuine. The religious one is that the men engaged in ḥadīth transmission also had a duty to uphold the teachings of the Prophet. This meant respecting the men of knowledge, regardless of age, background and social esteem.
5.50. Riważat al-Abnāʾ ‘an al-Ābāʾ - the Narration of the sons from the fathers.

From [the opposite of] this [form] is he who reports from his father, from his grandfather. Al-Háfiz Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-‘Alāʾī from the later scholars has compiled a large volume in identifying those who reported from their father, from their grandfather, from the Prophet. He has divided them into types; that from which the his in the statement ‘from his grandfather’ refers to the narrator, and that from which the his in the statement ‘from his grandfather’ refers to the narrator’s father. He has explained it and has evaluated it, as well as referred to the ḥadīth to be found in each form. Indeed I summarised the aforementioned book and added many other variations. The most number to be found where there is the continuous narration from the father to the son is fourteen fathers.

In this straight-forward section, Ibn Ḥajar describes the common cases where the sons narrate from their fathers. This is following a theme reflected in the previous sections where readers are informed of the novel factors which are shared between reporters.

217 The name of this book is al-Wāshi al-mu'allam fi man rawā ‘an abī ‘an jaddihī, ‘an al-nabī șalla Allāh ‘alayhi wa sallam.

218 For example, there is a sanad which reads: ‘Bahz ibn Ḥakīm from his father, from his grandfather, from the Prophet.’ This means the report stemmed from Bahz ibn Ḥakīm ibn Mu‘āwiya, from his father Ḥakīm and then from his grandfather Mu‘āwiya (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 259).

219 An example of this is the sanad ‘Amr ibn Shu‘ayb, from his father, from his grandfather. This means the report of ‘Amr ibn Shu‘ayb ibn Mu‘āmmad ibn ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Amr ibn al-‘Āṣ, from his father Shu‘ayb, from his grandfather ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Amr ibn al-‘Āṣ (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 257).

220 This is the prophetic report Laysa al-khabar ka-al-mu‘āyana, from ‘Alī which al-Qārī has quoted with its full ismād in his commentary of the Nuzhah (1994, 644-5).

221 Al-Munāwī notes that also included in the category of narration of the sons from the fathers is the narration of daughters from the mothers, though he admits this is extremely rare (1999, 2: 261).
Ibn Ḥajar suggests this issue is important for a variety of reasons. Firstly, as explained in the Nuzhah, the isnād sometimes mentions a reporter’s name followed by the remark ‘from his father, from his grandfather’. This can lead to ambiguity since it is not clear whether the statement ‘from his grandfather’ refers to the reporter’s grandfather or the father’s grandfather (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 256: Mīḥālīwī 2003, 550). So knowing this subject area can create clarity.

Secondly, one of the primary reasons for the rejection of a ḥadīth is the discontinuity of the isnād. In numerous ways, a report sometimes faces rejection because it cannot be proven that the disciple heard from whom he claims to have done so. To a large extent, the ‘family isnāds’ help us overcome this problem. The researcher will find that if the reporter is the father and the reported-to is the son, it is now difficult to reject such a ḥadīth on the basis of the non-meeting.

Thirdly, ‘family isnāds’ can mean more accuracy. Family members engaged in ḥadīth narration will enjoy extensive companionship and this prolonged company will mean more opportunities to check and revise the ḥadīth from the source.

Fourthly Ibn Ḥajar in this section is perhaps drawing on his own personal experiences. He himself married a ḥadīth scholar (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 97), in 798/1395. Ānas Khāṭūn was the daughter of al-Qāḍī Karīm al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Karīm ibn ‘Abd al-Azīz, and studied under al-Ḥāfīẓ Zayn al-Dīn al-‘Irāqī just as Ibn Ḥajar did. Ibn Ḥajar had one son – Badr al-Dīn Muḥammad – from a later marriage (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 100). Ibn Ḥajar paid utmost attention to his religious education and development. He memorised the Qur’ān and lead tarāwīḥ Prayers in 826/1422. The book Bulūgh al-marām min adillat al-aḥkām was written by Ibn Ḥajar as a dedication to his son (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 101). This shows that as Muslims passed on hadīths through the family in previous times, Ibn Ḥajar continued this religious duty within his own family too.

This last observation shows that viewed in a religious light, the narration of sons from their fathers was a reflection of the care and importance people took in the field of hadīth. Ensuring that their sons inherited knowledge and not just property and wealth was of paramount importance to early Muslims.

Along with these positive notes related to the ‘family isnāds’, there are some negatives. In early times, it was used as a means of deceitfully enhancing the appearance of the chain. Schacht writes:

> There are numerous traditions which claim an additional guarantee of soundness by representing themselves as transmitted amongst members of one family, for instance from father to son (and grandson)…whenever we come to analyse them, we find these family traditions spurious and we are justified in considering the existence of a family isnād not an indication of authenticity but only a device for securing its appearance (1959, 170).

Goldziher shows distrust to the sahīfa of ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Amr al-‘Āṣ precisely because it was passed down through his family (1971, 23). Even Azami accepted cases where reporters used such chains to circulate forged traditions (1996, 197).

Overall, I believe that the observations of Schacht and others on ‘family isnāds’ does not deter one from its significance. In fact, Schacht is actually acknowledging the security surrounding it. By writing that forgers would use it to secure the chain’s appearance, this proves that it was seen as rigid; otherwise forgers would not use ‘family isnāds’.

Secondly, if a family isnād was a means of ‘securing its appearance’ then surely we would see the existence of such chains more widespread in ḥadīth literature. The relatively small ratio of family chains compared to conventional ones therefore does not lend support to Schacht’s theory. Burton agrees when he notes that in terms of ḥadīth text statistics, the family isnāds are ‘of infrequent occurrence’ (1994, 111). Perhaps Robson strikes the correct balance when he remarked:

Was the family isnād invented to supply apparent evidence for spurious traditions, or did genuine family isnāds exist which later served as models? It seems better to recognise that they are a genuine feature of the documentation, but to realise that people often copied this type of isnād to support spurious traditions. Therefore, while holding that family isnāds do genuinely exist, one will not take them all at face value (1955, 23).

To conclude, this section shows that Muslims and non-Muslims do sometimes agree on an issue in the discipline. Their view points on family isnāds are not radically different, as both agree it was used for fraudulent purposes and both agree on its strengths too.

5.51. Ṣābiq & lāḥiq- the Preceding and the Reaching.

If two reporters share [in reporting] from one shaykh, and one’s death precedes the other’s, then this is Ṣābiq and lāḥiq. The most we have come across between two reporters in terms of death is one hundred and sixty years. This is as such because Abū ‘Alī al-Burdānī heard a ḥadīth from al-Ḥāflī al-Silafi who was one of his shaykhs. He narrated from him and died in 500/1106. Then the last from the companions of al-Salafī to hear from him was his grandson Abū al-Qāsim ‘Abd al-Raḥmān ibn Makkī, who died in 650/1252. An older example is that of al-Bukhārī who heard from his disciple Abū al-‘Abbās al-Sarrāj some reports on history and its likes. He died in 256/870. The last to hear from al-Sarrāj was Abū al-Ḥasan al-Khaffāf, who died in 393/1002.

The most common reason for this gap is that of the two reporters who have heard from the shaykh, one lives for a considerable time after the other. Then in the final days of the shaykh’s life, the other reporter (of lesser age) hears a report from him and lives for a long period thereafter. This results in the large time gap. And Allāh provides assistance.

Commentary

The terms sābiq and lāhiq refer to when two disciples have narrated traditions from one shaykh and there is a considerably large period in between. The one who dies first is referred to as the sābiq and the one who dies later (and heard from the same shaykh) is called lāhiq. Through experience of narration, the largest gap between the sābiq and lāhiq to be found was one hundred and fifty years. In the Nuzhah, the example of al-Bukhārī and al-Khaffāf is given, with their shaykh, Abū al-‘Abbās.

222 Al-Munāwī writes that the text should read his shaykh and not his disciple (1999, 2: 265).
Another example is al-Zuhrī and Aḥmad ibn Ismā‘īl, who both heard from Mālik. Al-Zuhrī died in 124/742 and Aḥmad died in 259/872, a gap of one hundred and thirty five years (Mīghālī 2003, 553).

The last few sections of the Nuzhah seem to touch on novelty factors related to the men of transmission in an isnād. Sābiq and lāhiq seems to be following this same pattern. It is difficult to justify such studies and how it helps ḥadīth authentication.

But a closer analysis shows that sābiq and lāhiq does have an academic function. The benefit of this is to prevent the wrongful assumption that there is a drop in the chain (al-‘Irāqī 1995, 385). It also touches upon the issue of older transmitters, which Juynboll has analysed in detail and used to deduce the fraudulent nature of prophetic reports. Juynboll draws attention to ‘the frequent occurrence of transmitters reportedly blessed by God with unusually advanced ages’ (1996, VII: 156), particularly in Kūfah. These mu‘ammarūn served an important function; they were introduced, or invented, to span the large gap between the common link reporters (present at the end of the first century) and the alleged Companion the report was supposed to have stemmed from (1996, VII: 160).

Because this span would be for more than sixty years, and because it would be more acceptable if the isnād was shorter, it made sense for the person to be one, old, solitary person.

Juynboll’s interesting findings do question ḥadīth transmission activities in the first century, particularly in Kūfah. But there are several matters which he overlooks. Firstly, his thesis is based on the premise that the majority of chains for the majority of prophetic reports consisted of sole reporters. He writes that:
In other words, canonical Muslim tradition literature is first and foremost characterised by the feature that the transmission of a particular saying allegedly uttered by the Prophet travelled during the first sixty to one hundred and fifty years or so of its existence along a path of consecutive single individuals. (1996, VII: 172).

There are thousands of reports to be found in the canonical collection that are either mashhūr or ‘azīz, namely where there are at least two transmitters in each generation. Secondly, Juynboll explicitly writes that the common link transmitters would routinely create false biographical information about the mu‘ammarūn, and that there were a ‘number of mu‘ammarūn who are invented, lock, stock and barrel, complete with their miraculously advanced age of death.’ (1996, VII: 175). As it will be shown in 5.64, any reporter in an isnād must be authenticated by at least two people according to many ḥadīth masters, or one reliable ḥadīth master at the very minimum. If Juynboll’s theory is accepted, then it means that the ḥadīth masters were authenticating imaginary figures, and were all part of the mass collusion to fill the gaps of forged chains. No indication is given from Juynboll as to how and why all the people in the field of sunnī ḥadīth literature, for centuries, all kept quiet and did not feel the need to become whistle-blowers.

Thirdly, there is another explanation for the wide gap between reporters sharing the same teacher. As the centuries progressed, the age at which reporters were allowed to sit in ḥadīth circles formally became younger (more will be said about this in section 5.67)

Fourthly and most importantly, Ibn Ḥajar’s analysis here shows that early Muslims did not have to span the gap between two reporters that were parted by a large number of years. This is because the concept of sābiq and lāhiq could explain the large gap. So this shows that to some degree at least, there was a justification to include a section on sābiq and lāhiq in the Nuzhah.

5.51.1. Conclusion.

Throughout his work, Ibn Ḥajar’s analysis of ḥadīth classification has shown the wide variety of forms the isnād would assume. As sābiq and lāhiq clearly shows, the isnāds would sometimes feature two reporters who were divided in age by a number of years. Elsewhere we have seen that the dispersed nature of the report means that there are several people in each generation, like mashhūr or ʿazīz. Some chains did not follow the conventional path of Prophet to Companion to Successor; his analysis of mursal has shown that the chain can pass amongst several Successors before eventually reaching the Companion.223 Common sense dictates that the usual pattern would be that the juniors would report from the elders, but riwāyat al-akābir ʿan al-aṣāghir shows that this pattern too can be broken.224 In short, there was no typical pattern of an isnād. Juynboll gives the impression that common link transmitters were persistent in creating an isnād in a typical and common manner, and that is where the muʿammarūn came in. But sābiq and lāhiq shows that there was no typical and common isnād, and that some justifiably took on the form where there would be a gap of a hundred years between two reporters.

5.52. Muhmal – the Obscure.

If a reporter narrates from two people who share the same name, or have the same father’s or grandfather’s name, or the same ascription and one cannot be differentiated from the other; then if both are credible then it does not harm [the authenticity of the hadith]. An example is that which occurred with al-Bukhārī in his narration from ‘Aḥmad’ – who is not described further – from Ibn Wahb. This is either Aḥmad ibn Ṣāliḥ or Aḥmad ibn ‘Isā. Or [the example of] ‘Muḥammad’ – who is not described further – of the people of ‘Irāq. For this is either Muḥammad ibn Salām or Muḥammad ibn Yaḥyā al-Dhuhalī. Verily I have encompassed these [obscurities] in the introduction to the Commentary of al-Bukhārī. Whosoever desires a comprehensive and accurate means by which one is identified from the other and one from the two is specified, then muhmal [as a means] is required. When one is not clear from the other in that the descriptions are shared by both, then this [results] in severe difficulty. One then must resort to [external] factors and overwhelming evidence.

In ‘ilm al-hadīth, there are some technical terms which have a very close overlap with other terms in the discipline and muhmal is one such example. There is only a subtle difference between muhmal and mubham. As explained earlier, mubham is where the person’s name in the chain has not been mentioned at all and instead the reporter merely says ‘such and such informed me’ or ‘the credible one informed me.’ Muhmal is slightly different in that the person’s name has been mentioned but because there are several people with the same name, it is still not clear who the reporter in question is.

226 Section 5.36.
Along with showing the close overlap with certain technical terms in the discipline, the section also serves to indicate the nature of research in the ninth Islamic century. As Ibn Ḥajar mentions, he included a section on muhmal in his introduction to Fath al-bārī, thus suggesting its importance. Knowing that Sulāyman reported the ḥadīth is not sufficient for the scholar. If this refers to Sulāyman ibn Dāwūd al-Khawlānī, then he is credible. If however it refers to Sulāyman ibn Dāwūd al-Yamāmī, then he is deemed a weak reporter (Ṭahṭān 2001, 165). This research will take on the form of analysing other reports where the reporter and the one who he is reporting from is mentioned (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 343).
Muhmal therefore indicates more detail, intricacy and assurance. It aims to clarify any vagueness in the reporters of the isnād.
However, muhmal also suggests that Ibn Ḥajar did not question the actual isnāds mentioned by al-Bukhārī. His duty was to gather additional information on the reporters who shared the same names so one could be clearly differentiated from the other. His duty was not to question whether the isnāds were actually fictitious.

Overall though, Muslim desired to show the exactness employed by their scholars and muhmal for them performs this function well. Muslims believe that based with such intricate levels of research on the reporters, it is perhaps difficult to believe that common-link transmitters simply ‘invented’ their authorities (Juynboll 1996, VII; 158). Ibn Ḥajar’s analysis of muhmal shows that a person could not simply say ‘Sulāyman reported to me’ and expect the report to gain acceptance. There would be extensive checks to identify which Sulayman the reporter is. In many ways, Muslim scholars argue that it is the detail which refutes the ‘mass collusion’ argument, like muhmal highlights.

5.53. Man ḥaddatha wa nasiya – The one who narrated and then forgot.

If the reporter narrates a ḥadīth from a shaykh and the shaykh then denies reporting it; then if he rejects it outright in that he says: ‘he lied to me’ or ‘I did not report this to him’, and a rejection occurs from him for that report, then this means one of them has lied, not specifically [one of them]. [Moreover] this will not be detrimental for any one of them, because of the contradiction [found in the verification]. If he rejects it with uncertainty in that he says ‘I do not remember this’ or ‘I do not know’, then the ḥadīth will be accepted according to the most correct opinion. This is because the shaykh may have forgot. It is also said that the ḥadīth will not be accepted, because the peripheral (i.e. that the disciple took it from the shaykh) follows the core (i.e. that the shaykh possessed the ḥadīth originally) in affirming the [authenticity of the] ḥadīth. In other words, when the core (shaykh) affirms the ḥadīth, the reporting of the peripheral (disciple) is proven. Similarly, it is therefore desirable that the same is applied in terms of verification. This opinion is refuted by the fact that the credibility of the periphery (disciple) stipulates his truthfulness, and the fact the core does not know of it will not negate it. Thus, affirmation is preceded over negation.227 As for analogy with the testimony, this is invalid because the testimony of the witness of the witness (periphery) is not heard over the testimony of the original witness when he is able to do so, as opposed to ḥadīth narration. Hence they are different [cases].

227 Or, to rephrase it, the certain is preceded over the uncertain and conviction is preferred over doubt.

In this discipline, al-Dāraquṭnī has compiled a book called Man ḥaddatha wa nasiya.

In it is that which offers support for the correct opinion. This is because there are many [cases mentioned in this book] where reporters narrated traditions. When these traditions were presented to them, they did not recall [reporting them]. But because of their trust with those who heard from them, they began to hear from those they had reported to. [This is] like the ḥadīth of Suhayl ibn Abī Śāliḥ, from his father, from Abū Hurayra as a raised report in the story of the testimony and the oath. ‘Abd al-‘Azīz ibn Muḥammad al-Darāwardī said: ‘Rabī‘a ibn Abī ‘Abd al-Raḥmān informed me, from Suhayl. He said: ‘I met Suhayl and asked him of it. He did not know of it. I said to him, verily Rabī‘a informed me of it from yourself.

228 The line of argument purported by scholars who say the report will not be accepted is that in terms of proving the hadīth’s authenticity, the shaykh is the core and the disciple is the periphery. If the hadīth cannot be affirmed from the core, then surely it cannot be proven authentic from the periphery, namely the student. The same applies to when declaring a report as non-authentic. The disciple here follows the lead of the shaykh. When the shaykh is refusing to affirm the hadīth, it is implausible to suggest that the disciple can (Anwar 2003, 153).

Moreover, in a testimony, when the original witness expresses uncertainty regarding the testimony given, then the witness of the witness too is put into doubt. For example, Zayd testifies that he witnessed a car crash and Suhayl testifies that Zayd was there at the scene. If later, Zayd expresses his doubt or uncertainty over whether he actually was there at the scene or not, this brings Suhayl’s testimony into dispute too. The same analogy is thus applicable to the shaykh and the disciple.

Ibn Ḥajar refutes this line of argument by stating that the credibility of the disciple suggests that he must also be truthful. This position cannot be overridden simply because the shaykh cannot remember whether he reported it to him or not. When there is no clear denial from the shaykh, then the conviction of the disciple is preferred over uncertainty of the shaykh (Anwar 2003, 153).

As for the testimony analogy, it is not applicable to the discipline of narration for several reasons. Firstly, when the core witness is able to bear witness, then the witness of the witness is not even considered. This is not the case with reporting prophetic traditions. Secondly, conventional testimonies can only be taken from free individuals; narrating traditions can be taken from slaves too. Thirdly, the testimony of two women is equal to one man in conventional testimonies; this is not the case with riwāya. Fourthly, conventional testimonies require two witnesses; riwāya can be accepted from one (al-Munāwī 1999, 2: 276).

229 This is referring to the famous case when the Prophet accepted one testimony and an oath, rather than the conventional two witnesses.
Thereafter, Suhayl used to say: ‘Rabī‘a informed me that I reported it to him, from his father.’ Examples as such are plentiful.

Commentary

This section refers to the cases where a disciple has taken a report from a shaykh, who thereafter expresses doubt over the occurrence. The author explains that this can take on two forms and outlines the rulings for each.

As a moral statement, this section is an acknowledgement from the ḥadīth scholars that no human is perfect, and that mistakes and forgetfulness can occur from anyone.

The task of the scholars is to accept this weakness and devise mechanisms to minimise its effect on ḥadīth literature. For Muslims, the rarity of such cases also points to the authenticity of ḥadīth literature. This is because it is liars who tend to forget, not the truthful.

5.54. Musalsal- the Enchained.

If the narrators coincide with one another in a chain from the chains in terms of words of delivery – like ‘I heard x who said I heard x’ or ‘x reported to me who said x reported to me’ and similarly other words of delivery – or in terms of other verbal forms – like ‘I heard x say I bear witness with Allāh that verily x reported to me’ to the end of the chain – or in terms of an action – like ‘we entered upon x and he gave us a date to eat’ to the end of the chain – or in terms of the same words and actions together – like their saying ‘x reported to me whilst holding his beard saying ‘I believe in fate’ to the end, then this is [called] musalsal. This pertains to the description of the isnād. Sometimes the enchaining occurs in most of the isnād, like the ḥadīth with Awwalīyya.230 The enchaining ends at Sufyān ibn ‘Uyayna only. Those who report [this tradition] enchained to its end have erred.231

Musalsal refers to when a similar attribute is to be found in all of the narrators of the report, or most of them. Ibn Ḥajar shows that this can take on three forms: similar in terms of words of delivery, similar in terms of action and similar in terms of words and action.

Other than the ones mentioned by Ibn Ḥajar, musalsal can take on other forms. If all the reporters share the same name – for instance, all are called Muḥammad – then this too will be referred to as musalsal (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 188). Similarly, all the reporters can originate from the same town or country or all can be renowned jurists.

Largely, musalsal simply adds to our knowledge of the reporters of the ḥadīth. When the isnād is musalsal in terms of action, it can lead to increased accuracy in the sense that one can appreciate that the disciple did not merely hear the ḥadīth, but also noted each and every action of the shaykh. Similarly, when the isnād is continuous with jurists or renowned scholars, this gives the impression of more accuracy (al-Munawwī 1999, 2: 286).

230 Literally, this means ‘the firsts’. Here, it means where all the reporters (or most of them) state that the report was the first they heard from the shaykh in question (al-Munawwī 1999, 2: 285).

231 Some scholars such as Abū al-Muẓaffar Muḥammad ibn ‘Alī Ṭabrī al-Shaybānī have erroneously assumed that the enchained report of Sufyān ibn ‘Uyayna is musalsal throughout, from beginning to end. This is not the case as the author points out (al-Munawwī 1999, 2: 285).
continuously narrate gives the benefit of al-‘ilm al-nažarī, so long as the report is not gharīb.

Conversely, it could be argued that musalsal reflects less accuracy and authenticity, not more. The continuous usage of ‘ḥaddathānī’ (x reported to me) through the isnād may be a sign of carelessness from a forger.

5.55. Şiyagh al-adā’- the words of delivery.

The words of delivery that indicate reporting are of eight stages. The first is samī’tu and ḥaddathānī. Then akhbaranī and qara’tu ‘alayhī – and this is the second stage. Then quri’a ‘alayhi wa-ana asma‘ – and this is the third. Then anba’anī – and this is the fourth. Then nāwalanī – and this is the fifth. Then shāfahanī, namely with ijāza, and this is the sixth. Then kataba ilayya, namely with ijāza, and this is the seventh. Then ‘an and its likes from the words of delivery that can possibly mean listening or ijāza, or [even] not hearing it. This is like with the words qāla and dhakara and rawā. Thus the first two words from the words of delivery – samī’tu and ḥaddathānī – are suitable for when he hears it alone from the words of the shaykh. The [terminological] specifying of taḥdīth for what he hears from the words of the shaykh (from memory) is famous amongst the people of ḥadīth. Literally, there is no difference between taḥdīth and ikhbār.

There is severe hardship in claiming a difference between the two (taḥdīth and ikhbār). However, since they have become established [as being synonymous] in terms of terminology, it has become a reality through customary use. Thus this opinion is preceded over what they mean literally. Moreover, this terminology [citing the difference between the two] has merely stemmed from the eastern scholars and those who follow them. As for the majority of the western scholars, they have not employed this terminology; rather for them taḥdīth and ikhbār have the same meaning.

If the narrator uses the plural form – namely he brings forth the first two words in the plural sense by saying samiْnā and ḥaddāthānā – then this is evidence that he heard the ḥadīth in the presence of others. Sometimes the nūn is for respect [and not to say he heard it with others] but this is seldom applied. The first of the two (namely samiْnā or samiْtu) is the clearest [word of delivery] to clarify the speaker heard it, because it does not result in the possibility of an [additional] source [in between], and because the word ḥaddāthānī is sometimes said in ijāza with tadlīs.

The highest [form of words of delivery] is that which occurs through imlāْ, because it entails [added] accuracy and memorisation.

The third – and this is akhbarānī – is like the fourth which is qaraْtuْ ‘alayhi for whosoever reads himself to the shaykh. If he uses the plural form in that he says akhbarānā or qaraْnā, then this is like the fifth, which is qurīْaْ ‘alayhi wa-ana sāmiْ. It is known from this [analysis] that when he has read it [to the shaykh] referring to it with qaraْtuْ ‘alayhi is better than akhbaranī, because it better indicates the actual state.

Note: According to the majority [of scholars], reading in the presence of the shaykh is one of the forms of receiving reports. Distanced [from the correct opinion] are those who have denied this, from the people of ‘Irāq.233 Verily al-Imām Mālik and other scholars of Madīna have vehemently refuted such an opinion to the extent that some have ranked qara’tu ‘alayhi higher than sami’tu from the words of the shaykh. A large group of scholars – from them al-Bukhārī [as mentioned] in the beginning of his Šaḥīḥ who cites from the imāms – have opted for the opinion that listening from the words of the shaykh and recitation to him are equal in terms of authenticity and strength. And Allāh knows best.

Inbā’ – literally and terminologically – is the same as ikhbār according to the earlier scholars, though the later scholars use it for ījāza (licensing) like ‘an.

The scholars have referred to verbal licensing as mushāfaha. Similarly, they have referred to written licensing as mukātaba; and this is common-practice in the texts of the later scholars, as opposed to the earlier scholars. For they only call it mukātaba when the shaykh writes the ḥadīth for the disciple, irrespective or whether he permitted him to narrate it or not. They do not call it mukātaba when the shaykh writes to him with licensing alone.

The scholars have placed the condition of permission to narrate for the legitimacy of a narration of munāwala. When this is achieved, then it constitutes the highest form of ījāza (licensing), because it entails specification and [exact] personage. Its form is that the shaykh gives his original manuscript or its equivalent to the disciple, or the disciple is presented with the shaykh’s original manuscript, and in both forms he says: ‘these are my narrations from x, so narrate them from me.’ Its [other] condition is that he has control over the manuscript, either through ownership or lease so that he may transfer it and study it. And if not, namely the student takes it and it is taken back immediately, then this is no longer the highest form, though it still has some distinction over the specified licensing (ijāza mu‘ayyana); this is when the shaykh grants permission to narrate a specific book of his and [also] specifies the method to narrate them.

233 Some scholars from Iraq have actually questioned whether reciting to the shaykh constitutes a form of reporting. Ibn Ḥajar expresses grave reservations about the validity of such an opinion. He cites al-Imām Mālik and other scholars of Madīna who vehemently refuted such an opinion. In fact some such as Abū Ḥanīfa and Layth went to the extent to rank qara’tu ‘alayhi higher than sami’tu from the words of the shaykh (al-Munāwī 1999, 2: 295). Al-Bukhārī, the scholars of Hijāz, al-Sakhawī and Zarkhashī did not rank qara’tu ‘alayhi higher than sami’tu but did suggest that they are at least equal in terms of authenticity and strength (al-Munāwī 1999, 2: 295).

When the munāwala is void of permission, then according to the majority of scholars it will not be considered [worthy of narration]. Those scholars who have permitted this have compared it to sending a book from one country to another. Hence a group from the imāms of ḥadīth have deemed such a practice as correct, even if this sending is not coupled with permission. It is as if the [actual] sending itself of the books is an indication of permission. I do not see a strong difference between the shaykh giving the book to the disciple and between sending the book from one place to the other, when both are void of permission.

Commentary

Ṣiyagh al-adā’ refers to the words employed by the ḥadīth reporters to express how they received their reports. Ibn Ḥajar offers a detailed section here on the words employed by ḥadīth transmitters and divides these various words into eight categories in terms of strength. They are:

(i) Samī‘tu (I heard x) and ḥaddathanī (x transmitted to me).

(ii) Akhbaranī (x informed me) and qara‘tu ‘alayhi (I recited to x).
(iii) Qūrī ‘alayhi wa-ana asma’ (It was recited to x whilst I was listening).
(iv) Anba’anī (x told me).
(v) Nāwalanī (x transferred to me).
(vi) Shāfahanī bi-al-ijāza (x shared with me with licensing).
(vii) Kataba ilayya bi-al-ijāza (he corresponded with me with licensing).
(viii) ‘An (from), dhakara (he mentioned), rawā (he narrated) and other words which can indicate he actually heard it directly or not.

For a first-time reader, the section is an excellent overview of ʿsiyagh al-adāʾ. The grading is mentioned in order, along with a brief description of the disputed terms. Certainly the extensive analysis given by the author suggests its importance. An important question is why Ibn Ḥajar felt the need to discuss ʿsiyagh al-adāʾ in such detail. The reason is not because it still mattered greatly in the ninth Islamic century. The words of delivery mattered more in the early period of Islam, before the documentation of the prophetic reports into collections like the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī (Kamali 2005, pp.13-14). As time progressed, it became less and less important. This is reflected by the fact that in al-Mayyānīshī’s (d. 581/1185) treatise on ʿilm al-ḥadīth, discussions on the words of delivery come early on in the text (Librande 1982, pp.42-43). In Ibn Ḥajar’s Nuzhah, the discussion comes near the end of the work.

Instead, it is plausible to suggest that the reason for the extensive coverage of ʿsiyagh al-adāʾ in the Nuzhah was to indicate the meticulous exactness and accuracy employed by the early transmitters in recording the traditions of their Prophet. For Muslim scholars, ʿsiyagh al-adāʾ symbolised how ḥadīth scholars covered all aspects of the field. They were not content with a simple guarantee that x took the report from y. Rather, they wanted assurances of how exactly that report was received; was it done individually or in a group? Did the ḥadīth master dictate it from memory or from his written records? Did the disciple read the traditions back to the ḥadīth master or did he simply listen? The rich literature surrounding siyagh al-adā’ helped us to answer these important questions. The extensive section in the Nuzhah therefore aimed to give comfort and assurance to the reader of the exactitude of early Muslims in recording early ḥadīth literature.

Indirectly, Ibn Hajar’s coverage of siyagh al-adā’ in the Nuzhah also indicates the primacy of oral transmission. This is proven by the fact that transmission through written forms alone is generally seen as inferior. More will be said on this in the conclusion of this section.

The attention given by the early and later ḥadīth scholars on siyagh al-adā’ cannot be overlooked. For example, 16% of al-Khatib al-Baghdādi’s al-Kifāya is devoted to such matters (1988, pp. 283-355). Despite this, there are inconsistencies that even Muslim scholars admit to regarding siyagh al-adā’. A few are mentioned below:

a. The ḥadīth scholars noted the words of delivery for each part of the chain. The exception was the Companions on how they took the report from the Prophet. Kamali notes:

When a Companion narrated a ḥadīth from the Prophet, he or she was not normally faced with the question of how he or she actually received it from the Prophet (2005, 14).
This indicates two possible things. Firstly, attention toṣiyagh al-adā’ did not exist in the Companion’s time and it only developed later. Secondly, it supports the notion of the ‘adāla of the Companions; that because Allāh had vouched for their integrity and truthfulness in the Qur’ān, there is no need for ḥadīth scholars to scrutinise them. But scrutiny is ideally required even for the Companions. Abū Hurayra only spent a short time with the Prophet. As a result, most of his reports commence with ‘the Prophet said’ rather than ‘I heard the Prophet (Brown 2009, 19). If such a word featured elsewhere in the chain (after the Companions), it would have been questioned by the Muslim scholars. Because it stems from a Companion here, it is not.

b. Perhaps the most pressing concern was thatṣiyagh al-adā’ was a rough guide to how the reporter actually took the ḥadīth, not an exact description. There were too many exceptions to the rule and inconsistencies for the area to be considered exact and scientific. The Nuzhah implicitly too suggests this reality. A few examples will highlight this fact:

i. Like other scholars before him, Ibn Ḥajar writes thatḥaddathanī is the strongest word of delivery. However, it can still be misused according to the Nuzhah for fraudulent purposes. Ibn Ḥajar writes that ‘the wordḥaddathanī is sometimes said in ijāza with tadlīs.’

ii. There is no consistency with the grading of these words. According to Ibn Ḥajar, sayingqāla and dhakara falls in the eighth category, indicating its relative weakness. It was known of Ibn Jurayj (d. 150/767) that he did not narrate anything without directly hearing it himself. Yet most of the reports from him simply state ‘qāla Ibn Jurayj’. So from these two opening observations, we see that the strongest word could be used for fraudulent purposes and the weakest word could be used for certainty.

iii. There are lingual inconsistencies too. Anba’an stems from the Arabic word naba’, which means ‘news’. In this respect, there should be no difference between anba’anī and akhbaranī, because the latter derives from khabar, which also means ‘news’. In fact, it could be argued that naba’ is stronger than khabar since the former means ‘news of grave importance’ (Ibn Manzūr 1988, iv: 8). Earlier scholars did hold the two as synonymous but later scholars preferred anba’anī to refer to cases where the report has been taken through the means of ijāza (licensing) (Anwar 2003, 159). So literally, anba’anī and akhbaranī are at least the same but in practice, the latter is considered much stronger.

Based on these observations, šiyagh al-adā’ could help to spot real forms of transmission but it was not foolproof. It was a rough guide to how each person heard the report. At the same time, the fact that šiyagh al-adā’ mattered so much is an indication of the scholars’ endeavours. At face level, it did indicate the ḥadith masters’ close scrutiny of matters pertaining to the isnād.

5.55.1. Conclusion.

What is clear from this analysis is that sami’tu (I heard x) and ḥaddathanī (x transmitted to me) are the highest words of transmission. The weakest forms of transmission are where written manuscripts are void of permission from the shaykh. This indicates that according to Ibn Ḥajar and hadith scholars, oral transmission holds a much greater rank and worth than the mere written form.

For many observers the primacy of oral transmission has been difficult to comprehend. The secure safeguarding of prophetic traditions seems difficult to argue when for at least one hundred years, written transmission and records were rare to say the least, or in the words of Muir, ‘meagre, suspicious and contradictory’ (1858, I: XXXII). Sidqi writes:

It is evident in every era and in every nation that people find it hard to preserve traditions, when they are lengthy or numerous and especially if they are reported only once, without corruption of the words and the meaning and without changes, additions or mistakes (in Brown 1999, 89).

In defence of oral transmissions, it must be noted that owing to their own experiences, non-Muslim observers have not fully appreciated how oral transmission can actually be viewed as more accurate rather than less. Certainly, the remarkable memory of the Arabs has been under emphasised (Azami 1992, 20). As Brown admits, ‘remarkable powers of memory are common among illiterate peoples, and the ability to memorise large amounts of information with precision was especially well developed among the Arabs’ (1999, 90). Secondly, an assumption is made that written records are far superior and more immune from forgery and change. This is not necessarily the case. Brown writes:

Regardless of whether reference was made to a written record, a report could only be transmitted by direct contact between master and student. Just as in legal matters documentary evidence carried little weight, so too in ḥadīth transmission, a written account was worthless without oral attestation (1999, 83).

Specific proof for Brown’s comments can be shown. In his analysis of the ‘ard method of transmission, Azami notes that the student would possess a copy of the traditions, as provided by the teacher. Whenever a student finished the reading of a ḥadīth he made a sign in the circle or somewhere else to show that this ḥadīth had been read to the teacher. This was necessary because even when a student knew ḥadīths through books, he was not entitled to use those materials for teaching or for his own compilation till he received them through properly recognised methods of learning. If one did not follow this method, he could be accused of ‘stealing a ḥadīth’, (sāriq al-ḥadīth), which meant that a scholar used material that he obtained through an incorrect manner (Azami 1977, 19). In other words, a written form still needed oral authentication.

Sidqi doubted whether the exact words of the Prophet could be preserved especially when they were mentioned only once. Along with his clear style of speaking, the Prophet did not merely relay his dialogue once, but deliberately repeated his remarks thrice. ‘Ā’isha has been quoted to have said that ‘the Prophet spoke in such a way that if one were to count his words, they could be counted’ (Kamali 2005, 11). Anas observed that when the Prophet spoke a word he repeated it three times until it was understood (Ibid.). Moreover, Sidqi does not evaluate how the Companions took steps to memorise them. It is well documented that the Companions set aside time for the oral memorisation of what they had heard and seen from the Prophet. An example is that of Anas ibn Mālik’s statement:
We sat with the Prophet, maybe sixty persons in number and the Prophet taught them hadīth. Later on when he went out for any necessity, we used to memorise it amongst us, when he departed it was as if cultivated in our hearts (Azami 1977, 13).

To conclude, when analysing the issue of oral transmission, because we see learning by memory alone as a defect, it does not necessarily mean the same for the early Muslims. In other words, a cultural gap exists which hinders us from understanding the issue entirely. Even today, thousands of Muslims throughout the world memorise the Qurʾān and are able to recite it on demand. In fact, Muslims who depended solely on their books were actually viewed in a lesser light by hadīth scholars. The lowly rank of wijāda proves this point implicitly. Brown makes an interesting point which makes it easier for us in the west to appreciate why the Muslims never felt the need for written records in the early period:

…[T]he Companions more often recounted their memories of the Prophet in oral form only. Even to modern readers accustomed to writing everything down, this is understandable to an extent; to them the Prophet was a contemporary figure whose words and deeds lived on in their memories as freshly as we remember our own teachers or parents. Only rarely do we put down these memories on paper (2009, 21).

234 Section 5.57.
This remark from Brown indicates that non-Muslims have not understood how special Muhammad was to his immediate followers. They did not need paper to register and record his sayings and actions. Their love for him meant very little about him escaped their memories.

Ibn Ḥajar’s work did not defend the practice of oral transmission over written reports to any great lengths openly in the Nuzhah. The fact that the issue did not arouse questions amongst early Muslims proves that oral transmission was a virtue and not a vice.

5.56. Mu‘ān‘an – the continuous ‘an.235

The statement of ‘an from the contemporary is deemed as an audible report (samā’), as opposed to a non-contemporary, as this is mursal or munqatī’. Therefore the condition for deeming it as samā’ is the proof of being contemporaries, except from the mudallis; this is not deemed as samā’. It is said that the condition for deeming the mu‘ān‘an as samā‘ from the contemporary is evidence of the meeting between the shaykh and the disciple, even if it is once. This is so immunity is achieved from the report being mursal khafī. This is the chosen opinion, in compliance with ‘Alī ibn al-Madīnī, al-Bukhārī and the other scholars.

Commentary

Mu‘ān‘an is where ‘an is used as a word of delivery throughout the chain, with no clarification as to whether this delivery was through the means of samā’, taḥdīth or ikhbār (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 214). Because of the lack of clarity in the word, the scholars have long disputed as to whether it should be assumed the person heard the report directly (samā‘) or not. Frequently, it has been the method of those who misrepresent the isnād (mudallis) to give the impression of samā‘ by employing words such as ‘an.

Similarly, it has been used in mursal khaft reports.236 In the Nuzhah, the author touches upon the dispute between al-Bukhārī and Muslim on this very issue. Al-Imām Muslim wrote in the introduction to his Šahīh that when the mu‘an‘an report does not contain a mudallis reporter and each narrator could have theoretically met the other, then it is accepted. He added that the requirement of proof of meeting was something his predecessors had never asked for (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 215). The opinion of al-Bukhārī, (and Ibn al-Madīnī)237 was that proof was needed to show the two actually met. The detail of this debate has been meticulously explained by Goldziher in his works (1971, pp. 228-9). This is certainly an indication that non-Muslims understood the intricate details of the discipline excellently. The question then arises as to why the Muslims are more sceptical to accept an opinion from the likes of Goldziher, even when it is clear they have some credible input to offer and when they understand the issue in question well. The answer is perception; because Muslims largely see the endeavours of non-Muslims aimed at degrading Islam, they do not welcome their views. To an extent, the Muslims do not focus on what is being said, but who is actually saying it. And when it stems from a non-Muslim, their mindset and intention is automatically questioned. Siddiqi shows this when he writes:

236 This is where a person narrates from someone – who is a contemporary of his or whom he has met – something which he has not heard, with words of delivery which suggest that he could have heard from him, like ‘an.

237 It is said that al-Bukhārī did not see this as a condition for a prophetic report to be deemed as šahīh; rather this is a requirement he adhered to alone for his own compilation (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 216).
We do not need Foucault to remind us that academic discourse is a product of power relationships: Goldziher’s diary gives us very adequate proof that scholarly theories, especially those involve the assessment of one culture by a historical rival, can easily be deconstructed into their psychological, historical and political constituents. The point is often noted, too, that American scholars, whose government has had no direct colonial involvement in Muslim countries, have in the past been somewhat more sympathetic to Islamic culture and its scholarship than their European colleagues (1993, pp.134-5).

5.56.1. Conclusion.

_Mu‘an’an_ can be viewed in two contrasting ways. Firstly, the presence of ‘an throughout the isnād points to the weakness of it, because the reporter is avoiding words such as _akbarānī_ (x informed me) which show conviction that he heard the report. ‘An can be thus seen as a loophole by which contentious and even fraudulent reporters can avoid detection and forgery since the usage of this term suggests non-committal.

Secondly, a case could be made for the depth and rigidity of the ḥadīth scholars’ investigations. Not only is the reporter himself subject to analysis, but _how_ exactly he heard the report and which term is used to affirm this hearing. ‘An is thus suspicious because one cannot wholly establish the continuity of the isnād.
5.57. Wijāda & wašiyya—The Discovery and the Bequest.

Similarly, the scholars have laid down the condition of permission with wijāda; this is when he finds [the book] with the handwriting of one he knows. Thus he says: ‘I found with the handwriting of x’. By finding it, he cannot merely say ‘x informed me’ (akhbaranī) except when he has permission to narrate from him. Some people have used this term [of akhbaranī when one finds the book] and by doing so have erred.

Similar is the case with wašiyya; this is when the shaykh bequeaths the book or books at the time of his death or at the time of travelling, to a specific person. Verily a group from the earlier imāms has allowed the narration merely by the means of the bequest. The majority have not permitted the narration, except when it is coupled with permission.

Commentary

The sequence chosen by Ibn Ḥajar here is crucial to appreciate because it allows us to appreciate the development of siyagh al-adā. In section 5.55, the Nuzhah highlighted the eight grades of words, which overall suggested the rigidity of the system. This section on wijāda and wašiyya suggests the relaxation that crept in to the system. Then the next section on i’lām highlights how the system became open to abuse and allowed some absurd situations to arise. For this reason, Ibn Ḥajar’s Nuzhah and the section sequence is useful in painting the gradual decline in the importance of siyagh al-adā.

Ibn Ḥajar indicates the weakness surrounding wijāda quite openly. Whereas before (in section 5.55), the importance of face-to-face transmission was applauded, wijāda encourages a system where a reporter can take possession of reports without even sitting with the shaykh. Instead, he merely needs to be able to identify the handwriting. More worrying is the fact that Ibn Ḥajar states that some Muslims would use the highest word of delivery – akhbaranī – to indicate taking possession of reports through this means. Again, like we highlighted in section 5.55, the strongest words were used to describe transmission in the weakest form. The Nuzhah indicates the disliked nature of wijāda but it does not condone it outright. Interestingly, al-Suyūṭī notes that there are many reports to be found in the Musnad of Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal which take on the form of wijāda (1972, 2:61).

Wasīyya is where the shaykh gives his ḥadīth manuscripts to a particular person as he approaches death, or as he embarks on a journey. This too was problematic because it was often void of permission. Some earlier scholars however argue that the shaykh would only give the book if he wanted others to report it after his demise or disappearance. In other words, the fact that the book has been handed over itself is a form of permission. The majority of scholars – which include the likes of al-Nawawī (Mīghālī 2003, 570) – do not accept this argument; he may have bequeathed the book but he did not give permission to narrate it (Tahḥān 2001, 125).

In short therefore, it seems that according to the Muslim scholars, both wasīyya and wijāda are only legitimate when there is clear evidence of permission to narrate. Or to rephrase, when there are more checks in place to ensure the bequeathed fully 238 Moreover, al-Suyūṭī identifies three reports in the Sahīh of Muslim where the isnād features wijāda: This isnād is ‘Abū Bakr ibn Abī Shayba informed us who said, I found in the book of Abū Usāma, from Hishām, from his father…’ However, al-Rashīd al-Īṭār quickly points out that these three reports have also been mentioned through another supporting isnād, through the means of Hishām and Abū Usāma without wijāda (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 61-2).

comprehends what has been given to him. Again, this highlights the benefits of oral transmission over written ones.

5.58. Iʿlām – The declaration.

Similarly the scholars have specified the condition of permission in iʿlām; this is when the shaykh informs one of his disciples that he has narrated book x from person y. If this is coupled with permission, then it is considered. And if not, it is not, just like the ijjāza ‘ammā (general permission) in which he says: ‘I grant permission to all Muslims’ or ‘to everyone who is a contemporary of mine’ or ‘to the people of x territory’ or ‘to the people of x country.’ [This last form] is closest to correctness because of more restriction. Likewise [permission is required] for the ijjāza majhūl, in that he states an unidentified person or unidentified book. Similarly [permission is required] for the ijjāza maʿdūm, in that he says: ‘I give permission to whom shall soon be born’. It is said that specifying a living person is correct, in that he says: ‘I give permission to you and whoever you bore’. The opinion closest to the correct position is that it is not legitimate either. And similarly [permission is required] for the permission to the present or non-existent which is dependant on the wish of others, in that he says: ‘I give you permission if x wishes’ or ‘I give permission to whomever x wishes’, as opposed to when he says: ‘I give you permission if you wish’. This is the correct opinion in all these cases [that it will not be considered]. Verily al-Khaṭīb has permitted all of these forms bar the [ijjāza] majhūl when the person [or book] is not specified. He has cited the permissibility from a group of his shaykhs.

From the classical scholars, ijjāza maʿdūm has been employed by Abū Bakr ibn Abī Dāwūd and Abū ‘Abd Allāh ibn Manda. The attached [form of permission] has been used too, by Abū Bakr ibn Abī Khaythama. Many scholars have permitted ijāza ʿāmma (general permission); some of the ḥāfiẓs have gathered these forms in a book in alphabetical order due to their sheer number.

All of these forms, as Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ states, are a disliked leniency. This is because there is a severe dispute in accepting the specified ijāza, though the later scholars accept this form. This is less than the audible (samāʿ) unanimously, so how less in rank will the aforementioned forms be? Verily, it will be much weaker. However, these forms are still better than narrating them as muʿdīl.

With this, the discussion on the words of delivery has ended.

If anything, iʿlām indicates the end of any importance attached to siyagh al-adāʾ. The Nuzhah gives clear indication of the abuse it resulted in, statements such as ‘I give permission to whom shall soon be born’ ‘I permit ‘Abd Allāh to report from me’, (when there is no clarification which ‘Abd Allāh is being referred to) and ‘I give permission to all my contemporaries to report from me’. In fact, Ibn Ḥajar highlights how some scholars actually agreed with such forms, like Abū Bakr ibn Abī Dāwūd and Abū ‘Abd Allāh ibn Manda.

The problems with iʿlām are stark. When a shaykh gives universal permission to report from him, one cannot expect this transmission to be void of shortcomings and discrepancies. If the person receiving the report does not fully understand the ḥadīth in question, or cannot comprehend the text in the book, there is no real means of verification available to him. Goldziher reports that Ibn Waḍḍāḥ said:

‘Abd al-Malik b. Ḥabīb visited me and brought a load of books which he put before me saying, “This is your contribution to scholarship. Grant me ījāza to teach it all in my turn.” I granted his request, but he never himself has never heard a word from me personally and I have never lectured to him (1971, 177).

Admittedly, the majority of scholars frowned upon such forms of transmission. Ibn Ḥazm described reporting in these forms as a ‘disallowed innovation’ (al-Munāwī 1999, 2: 315). But the scholars’ rejection of this method simultaneously tells us that it did exist.

5.58.1. Conclusion.

Progressively, ṣiyagh al-adāʾ became less and less important. Early discussions held by ḥadīth scholars centred on how exactly the person received the report from the visible shaykh. By the fifth Islamic century, ījāza in absentia (ījāza maʿdūm) had become normal (Goldziher 1971, 177). The early period of ḥadīth collection was marked by zealous travels by eager disciples. Later, ījāza was a factor in the decrease of such journeys. Goldziher observes:

*Ijāza became a surrogate for those Muslims who were eager to obtain ḥadīths but either did not think long journeys convenient or when they did go on ṭalāb travels were not able to stay long enough in the home town of the ‘carrier’ of the hadīths to receive them directly from him (1971, 176).

In the early period, the disciple’s ability was assessed to see whether he was capable of carrying and understanding the words of the Prophet. As time passed, seeking ījāza became a social pastime which enhanced a Muslim’s standing in the community. In fact, others turned to the system to make material profit from it (Goldziher 1971, 178).

Ibn Ḥajar does not describe the abuses associated with siyagh al-adā’ in great detail, like, for example, Goldziher does. But I believe he says enough in the section to reflect the benefits and drawbacks of it. He is honest, even if it is only indirectly, about how siyagh al-adā’ reached absurd stages with i’lām and ījāzat ma’dūm. And he is also clear about how the system was an indication of the great care early hadīth scholars took in recording and preserving the ḥadīth literature.

Then the reporters; if their names and the names of their fathers upwards are the same and they are [in reality] different people – regardless of whether two share the same name or more – and likewise when two or more share the same kunya and nisba, then this is a type which is called muttafiq and muftariq. The benefit of this [discipline] is to [prevent] the fear of assuming two different people being one.
Verily al-Khaṭīb has compiled a vast book on this. I summarised this and added much more.

This type is the opposite of the type which has passed called muhmal. With muhmal, it is feared that one person is actually two. With this type, it is feared that two people are really one.

Commentary

Muttafaq and muftariq refers to the case one name of the reporter is shared by two or more different individuals. It is so called because it is agreeing (muttafaq) in terms of the name and it is different (muftariq) in terms of the persons it refers two. The purpose of this area is simple; to prevent people from seeing one name and assuming it only refers to one individual when it reality it refers to two or more.

This type does share some similarity with muhmal. The difference is subtle; with muhmal there is a chance that one person is assumed to be two different individuals. With muttafaq and muftariq, there is a chance that two people are assumed to be one.

An example of muttafaq and muftariq is the name Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd Allāh al-Anṣārī. This is the name of two individuals; Qāḍī Abū ‘Abd Allāh Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd Allāh al-Anṣārī from whom al-Bukhārī took reports, and Abū Salama Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd Allāh al-Anṣārī, who is considered a weak reporter (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 362).

The section is a reminder of how the ḥadīth scholars coined technical terms for all types of cases and scenarios where the need was actually minimal. With only a small difference between muttafaq and muftariq on the one hand and muhmal and the other, there was perhaps not a requirement to add more terms to the discipline. The section also points to the great care the ḥadīth scholars took in ensuring each and every reporter could be reasonably differentiated from another. The fact that Ibn Ḥajar wrote a separate book on this topic area suggests that it was still deemed important, even by the ninth Islamic century.

[239] This has been mentioned previously in section 5.52.

5.60. Mu’talif & mukhtalif – the similar and the different.

If the names are the same in terms of writing but differ in pronunciation, irrespective of whether this difference is in terms of the dots or the form, then this is mu’talif and mukhtalif. Knowing this is one of the most important [parts] of this discipline [of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth]. This is to the extent that ‘Alī ibn al-Madīnī said: ‘The most errors [in reading] occur in the names.’ Others have explained that [there is severe difficulty in correctly reading the names] because identifying it cannot be based on analogy, nor is there something prior or after the text to indicate [the correct form].

Verily, Abū Aḥmad al-‘Askarī compiled a book on this field but he amalgamated it to another book compiled on spelling errors (taṣhīf). Then ‘Abd al-Ghanī ibn Saʿīd wrote an independent treatise on it and he included in it two books; one [mentioning] the confusing names and one [mentioning] confusing ascriptions. Then the shaykh [of ‘Abd al-Ghanī ibn Saʿīd] al-Dāraquṭnī compiled a comprehensive book on the topic. Then, al-Khaṭīb [al-Baghdādī] completed this book. Thereafter, Abū Naṣr ibn Mākūlā gathered all of the previous works in his book al-Ikmāl. In another treatise, he gathered all of the obscure names not mentioned in previous works and offered an explanation for each. His book is the most comprehensive [of the ones prior to him] and thus is the depended source for ḥadīth scholars after him. Names which Abū Naṣr missed out or the new names [of obscurity] were compiled in a large volume of work by Abū Bakr ibn Nuqṭa. Then, Maṇṣūr ibn Salīm – with a fāṭha on the letter sīn – completed this in an outstanding volume. Similarly, Abū Ḥāmid ibn al-Ṣābūnī also offered a completion of this work. Al-Dhahabī also wrote a very brief treatise on the discipline. He depended on mere indication when writing the exact pronunciation and thus there are many mistakes and clear errors in it, which therefore contradict the purpose of the book. Allāh has enabled ease for us in clarifying this in a book which I named Tahṣīr al-muntabih bi tahṣīr al-mushtabih. This consists of one volume and I have arranged the names alphabetically in a manner worthy of praise. In it, I added a considerable amount which al-Dhahabī did not include or did not come across. Praise is for Allāh in this.

According to the Nuzhah, mu’talif and mukhtalif is certainly one of the most important and difficult areas of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth to comprehend. It refers to when a name looks identical in terms of writing, but differs in terms of pronunciation. For example, the name Salām can also be read Sallām; when written they look identical (Ṭaḥḥān 2001, 161). Similarly, when it is written without the dots on the letters, the name al-Bazzār and al-Bazzāz look identical. As Ibn Ḥajar explains, identifying the correct pronunciation in the names is made harder by two factors. Firstly, the names cannot usually be identified by the means of analogy. In other words, one cannot exert his own thought to evaluate whether the name is Salām or Sallām. Secondly, when there is an ambiguous word in the matn, one can examine the text surrounding the word and reach a reasonably-rigid conclusion as to what the word is. However, the same cannot be done when there is an ambiguous word in the isnād. Moreover, al-‘Uthaymin writes that the problem was more severe in earlier times when the writings did not include the dots and harakas on the letters (2002, 351).

There are some shortcomings in this section from Ibn Ḥajar. Firstly, he does not mention the methods used by scholars to identify the correct pronunciation for unclear names. For this, there are two main methods. Firstly, the scholars have analysed which names are used for a particular compilation. For instance, it is said that the name Yasāʾr has featured as a reporter in all of the reports to be found in the two Sahīhs and the Muwatṭaʾ of Mālik (Ṭahḥān 2001, 162). Secondly, the scholars have identified the common and oft-used pronunciation for a particular name and have then alerted the reader of the few exceptions. For example, it is said that wherever it is found, the correct pronunciation is Salām; then the reader is informed of the handful of exceptions where it is in fact Sallām (Ṭahḥān 2001, 162).

Secondly, there are no examples given of muʿtalif and mukhtalif in the Nuzhah, which is not typical for the author. In contrast, Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ’s own analysis is littered with over twenty examples (1986, pp. 344-358) Instead, Ibn Ḥajar uses the section on muʿtalif and mukhtalif to provide a comprehensive historical list of books and compilations on this topic. Perhaps the reason for this is so he could explain the literature background for his own work on the topic, Tabṣīr al-muntabīn bi tahrīr al-mushtabīn.240 The way Ibn Ḥajar has done this in the Nuzhah indicates three things. Firstly, it highlights his humility.

Before highlighting his own literature, he acknowledges the endeavours of his predecessors and their influence in shaping his own work. Secondly, it indicates how literature on a particular topic area within hadith studies developed through the ages. Like with so many other areas within the discipline, it was the fourth and fifth century scholars who pioneered the research, and later scholars merely refined the works.

Finally, Goldziher remarked that: ‘Nobody is allowed to say: ‘because the matn contains a logical or historical absurdity I doubt the correctness of the isnād’’ (1971, 141). This section, which highlights the preoccupation with the isnād, confirms what many non-Muslim scholars like Goldziher believed.

If the names resemble one another in [terms of] writing and pronunciation; and the [name of the] father’s differ in terms of pronunciation though similar in writing – like Muḥammad ibn ‘Aqīl (with a fatḥa on the ‘ayn) and Muḥammad ibn ‘Uqayl (with a damma), the first being Nīsābūrī and the second being Faryābī who are both famous and of the same generation – or the opposite occurs; namely that the [actual] name differs in terms of pronunciation and is different in writing, and the [name of the] father’s is the same in pronunciation and writing – like Shurayḥ ibn al-Nu‘mān and Surayj ibn al-Nu‘mān (the first is read with a shīn and ḥā’; he is a Successor who reported from ‘Alī ✠, and the second is read with a sīn; he is one of the shaykhs of al-Bukhārī) – then this a type which is called mutashābiḥ. The same is said if the name and father’s name is similar but there is difference in the nisba.

Verily, al-Khaṭīb [al-Baghdādī] has written an outstanding book which he called Talkhīs al-mutashābiḥ. He then added that which he had previously not mentioned [in a new book] which is of great benefit.

Many categories are generated from this type (namely mutashābiḥ) and the one before it (namely mu’talif and mukhtalif). From these categories is when the resemblance occurs in the name and the father’s name, for instance, except in a letter or two. This is then of two types; either the number of letters in the names is the same but there is difference in one or two letters, or the number of letters is not the same in one name compared to the other. The example of the first type is Muḥammad ibn Sinān (with a kasra on the sīn and two nūns divided with an alif) can refer to a group of [possible] individuals. From them include al-‘Awaqī (with a fatḥa on the ‘ayn and alif) who is the shaykh of al-Bukhārī. From this type also include Muḥammad ibn Sayyār (with a fatḥa on the sīn, a double yā’ followed by a rā’) who can also refer to many individuals, which include al-Yamāmī who is the shaykh of ‘Umar ibn Yūnus. From this type includes Muḥammad ibn Ḥunayn (with a ḍamma on the ḥā’ and two nūns, the first having a fatḥa, and divided with a yā’); he is a Successor who reported from Ibn ‘Abbās as well as others; and Muḥammad ibn Jubayr (with a jīm, followed by a bā’ and rā’) along with Muḥammad ibn Jubayr ibn Muṭʿīm, the renowned Successor.

Amongst these types include Muʿarrif ibn Wāṣil, the famous Kūfan, and Muʿarrif ibn Wāṣil (with a ṭāʾ in place of the ‘ayn), who is another shaykh from which Abū Ḥudhayfa al-Nahdī has reported. Also from this type is Aḥmad ibn Ḥusayn, companion of Ibrāhīm ibn Saʿīd as well as others, and Aḥyad ibn Ḥusayn, which is similar to the first name except there is a mīm in place of the yā’. He is the shaykh of al-Bukhārī, from which ‘Abd Allāh ibn Muḥammad al-Baykandī has reported. From these types is also Ḥafṣ ibn Maysara, the famous shaykh from the generation of Mālik, with Jaʿfar ibn Maysara, the shaykh of ‘Ubayd Allāh ibn Mūsā al-Kūfī. The first is read with a ḥāʾ, fāʾ and sād and the second is read with a jīm, ‘ayn and then a rā’.

And the example of the second type241 is ‘Abd Allāh ibn Zayd, who can be [referring to] many; of them from the Companions include the one who reported the ḥadīth regarding the call to Prayer (adḥān) whose grandfather’s name was ‘Abd Rabbih, and the one who reported the ḥadīth on ablution whose grandfather’s name was 241 Namely, where the number of letters are not the same in the names in question.

‘Āṣim. Both were Anṣār. [Then there is] ‘Abd Allāh ibn Yazīd (with an extra alif in the name of the father, and a kasra on the zā’), which too can refer to many [individuals]. Of them from the Companions include al-Khaṭmī, who was given the kunya Abū Mūsā and whose ḥadīth can be found in the two Ṣaḥīḥs. [The name ‘Abd Allāh ibn Yazīd also] includes al-Qārī, who is mentioned in the ḥadīth of ‘Ā’isha.

Some have deemed him to be al-Khaṭmī, in which there is doubt.

From this type include ‘Abd Allāh ibn Yahyā, which again refers to many, and ‘Abd Allāh ibn Nujayy (with a āmāma on the nān and a fatha on the ſīn and a double yā’); he is a famous Successor who reported from ‘Alī ﷺ.

[Also included in the category of mutashābi is where] there is similarity in terms of writing and pronunciation, but there is difference and confusion in terms of preceding and delaying. This is either in both names or its likes, in that the preceding and delaying happens in one name in relation to some letters. The example of the first is al-Aswad ibn Yazīd and Yazīd ibn al-Aswad, and this is apparent. And [another example of this is] ‘Abd Allāh ibn Yazīd and Yazīd ibn ‘Abd Allāh. The example of the second is Ayyūb ibn Sayyār and Ayyūb ibn Yasār; the former is a famous resident of Madīna who is not strong and the latter is unknown (majhūl).

242 This means they belonged to the group of Companions who did not migrate from Makka but originally resided in Madīna.
243 Namely where the name has been preceded and delayed.
244 The author means that it is apparent that al-Aswad ibn Yazīd is referring to the Successor and that Yazīd ibn al-Aswad is referring to the Companion.
Commentary

In this detailed and self-explanatory section, the author refers to mutashâbih. This is where the names are very similar sounding and hence results in possible confusion. As with the previous type, the problem is perhaps amplified when one remembers that earlier works were void of the harakas and dots on the letters.

Four points are worthy of mention here. Throughout the book, Ibn Ḥajar has never felt the need to mention numerous examples to explain a certain classification of ḥadīth. In fact, there are a handful of places where no examples at all are offered, such as with munkar (section 5.26) and indeed the previous section. It is interesting to note that in this section, Ibn Ḥajar offers more than one example for each of the different variations of mutashâbih.

It is apparent that this inconsistency in detail is quite deliberate from Ibn Ḥajar. This is because this type of ḥadīth is perhaps best described by real, practical examples rather than an outline of how to spot such a ḥadīth. Without actually showing how names have been wrongly and rightly attributed to the actual person, it is difficult – if not impossible – for the disciple to grasp the importance of mutashâbih. Certainly, this indicates Ibn Ḥajar’s maturity and originality in his teaching methods.

Secondly, Ibn Ḥajar shows here that mutashâbih – as well as mu’talif and mukhtalif – implicitly supports the argument that oral transmissions amongst the ḥadīth scholars were preferred and more reliable. The difficulty in deciding whether it is Salām or Sallām is amplified in the absence of a shaykh and it is solved in his presence. A written report is only of worth and significance if it is backed up by oral transmission. The first revelation to Muḥammad in the Cave of Ḥirā was done orally (from the Archangel Gabriel) and not in written form. Symbolically this teaches Muslims that the true method of teaching and receiving knowledge is through a shaykh, and not just mere dependence on a written scripture. As mutashābih shows, the written form (without oral support) is sometimes inadequate and creates more problems than it solves.

Thirdly, the difference between mu’talif, mukhtalif and mutashābih is very nominal. One could seriously question whether such an abundance of technical terms was really required to cover such a narrow topic area. In the early period of the discipline, there was a real need to standardise the terms; several examples have been offered of these types in the Nuzhah already. But a time eventually appeared when terms were introduced for the sake of it, not because of real requirement. For ḥadīth scholars, this equalled development and academic progress. By the time of al-‘Irāqī (d. 806/1403), (the teacher of Ibn Ḥajar), the excessive technical terms became the goal per se, reflected by the fact that al-‘Irāqī’s book on ‘ilm al-ḥadīth was called Alfiyya, the Thousand. Judging by the title, the aim of the book was to laud the state of the discipline with its thousand technical terms and definitions, rather than subjectively and critically assess the field.

Fourthly, the detail and precision of this section may have been a product of Ibn Ḥajar’s time and climate. There were ḥadīth transmitters in the ninth Islamic century who had sacrificed accuracy for elevation (Dickinson 2002, 500). The true carriers of ḥadīth were marked by the correct pronunciation of names, especially similar-sounding ones. The depth of this section was thus a statement from Ibn Ḥajar that he belonged to the very best of ḥadīth transmitters of his era.
5.62. Conclusion; Knowing the generations of the reporters, their birth-dates, their death-dates and their places of origins and travels.

Important for the ḥadīth masters is knowing the generations (ṭabaqa) of reporters. The benefit of this [discipline] is immunity from possible confusion, the increased chances of identifying the tadhīlīs and uncovering the essence of what is meant from the ‘an’āna. The ṭabaqa in the ḥadīth masters’ terminology is used to refer to a group who are similar in age and in meeting the shaykhīs. Sometimes, one individual belongs to two generations through two different factors, like Anas ibn Mālik. For in terms of companionship with the Prophet ﷺ he is regarded as the generation of Ten. 245 And in terms of his young age [when he met the Prophet] he is classified as from the generation thereafter. Thus whosoever views the Companions according to ‘companionship’ has made all of them as one generation, like what Ibn Ḥibbān and others have done. And whosoever has viewed them in terms of additional factors, like in terms of when they accepted Islām, or participation in the excellent events or the Migration, has thus made the Companions into many generations. This is what Abū ‘Abd Allāh Muḥammad ibn Sa‘d al-Baghdādī has inclined himself to. His book is the most comprehensive of all in this field. 246

The same applies to those after the Companions, and they are the Successors. Those who have viewed them in terms of taking [reports] from some Companions have made them one generation, as Ibn Ḥibbān has done. And those who have viewed them in terms of meeting have divided them, as Muḥammad ibn Saʿd has done. For each one of them is a reason [for their particular methodology.]

246 This work is called Ṭabaqāt ibn Sa‘d.

Also important is knowing their birth-dates and their death-dates, because by knowing this, the truth is achieved from the claim of someone that he met another, when in reality, he did not. Also important is knowing their countries; the benefit of this is safeguarding oneself from confusion in two similar names that are different in terms of affiliation.

Commentary

Ibn Ḥajar offers a brief overview of ṭabaqāt al-ruwāt, or the generations of reporters. In ʿilm al-hadīth terminology, this is the area which looks to classify reporters according to certain elements, mainly when they lived, when they died and which shaykh they heard ḥadīth from (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 2: 381).

It seems that here, Ibn Ḥajar felt the need to defend the rich literature compiled by his Muslims predecessors on the reporters. He points out in the text that it serves many important functions. Firstly, when an isnād features the consecutive ʿan as a word of delivery, then knowing which generation each reporter belongs to can help us identify whether each part of the isnād is based on actual hearing or not. The same applies to when a reporter attempts to misrepresent the ḥadīth through the practice of tadlīs.

Secondly, as the previous section has highlighted, the ḥadīth scholars sometimes experience difficulty in pinpointing which reporter is which when two or more share the same name or similar sounding names. The discipline of ṭabaqāt al-ruwāt is a useful tool in differentiating such individuals.
What Ibn Ḥajar does not defend is why the same type of work was duplicated several times by his predecessors, albeit in slightly different form. The ḥadīth masters fulfilled the same purpose but merely presented the work in different ways. Ibn Ḥībbān, Ibn Saʿd and al-Ḥākim all compiled works on the Companions, but presented it differently. Whereas Ibn Ḥībbān treated all the Companions as one category, al-Ḥākim divided the Companions into twelve sub-divisions (Mīghālwī 2003, pp. 530-1). This is an indication of the academic stagnation that unfortunately marked the discipline of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth.

There is also a rare academic mistake from Ibn Ḥajar in the Nuzhah in this section. When referring to Anas ibn Mālik, he writes that in terms of companionship with the Prophet, he is regarded as the generation of Ten, namely the ten individuals given glad-tidings of paradise during their lifetime. This is incorrect as Anas is not part of this group. The ten Companions in question were in fact Abū Bakr, ‘Umar, ‘Uthmān, ‘Ālī, Ṭalḥa, Zūbayr, ‘Abd al-Raḥmān ibn ‘Awf, Saʿd ibn Abī Waqqās, Saʿīd ibn Zayd and Abū ʿUbaydā ibn al-Jarrāh.

By using the example of Anas ibn Mālik and the Companions, Ibn Ḥajar gives the impression that ṭabaqāt al-ruwāt mattered more for the early Muslims. The section also indicates the academic reasons behind this area, which he states is ‘immunity from possible confusion, the increased chances of identifying the tadlis and uncovering the essence of what is meant from the ‘an‘ana’. What he totally avoids here is how tabaqāt al-ruwāt may have had social benefits, not for early Muslims, but Muslims of his time.

As this section in the Nuzhah has indicated, the classification of reporters was not necessarily based on dates, but ‘meeting shaykhs’. Or to word it differently, what was stressed was not which year a reporter was born in, but which place he occupied in the chain in terms of elevation. Regardless of when a person was born or when he died, the focus was on how many intermediaries existed between him and the Prophet and this meant, as al-‘Irāqī indicated, using the isnād as the basis for deciding which generation a person belonged to (Dickinson 2002, 504). In Ibn Ḥajar’s time, the earlier children could attend ḥadīth sessions and have their presence recorded officially in the registers, the easier it was for them to be included in earlier tabaqas with fewer intermediaries. Dickinson writes that:

> It is interesting to note that the word used for “generation”, tabaqā, is the same as the one most commonly applied to the document commemorating the audition of a text (2002, 504).

This analysis shows that tabaqāt al-ruwāt in its simplest form was a means of gathering information on reporters. In a more complex form, it perpetuated the obsession with seeking elevation, particularly for later generations like Ibn Ḥajar’s era.

Also important is knowing the reporters’ state in terms of discrediting, accrediting and [whether his actual state is] unknown. This is because either the reporter is known for his integrity, for his lewdness or nothing is known about his state. After knowing this, it is important to know the stages of discrediting and accrediting, because the scholars sometimes defame a person with something that does not necessitate rejecting all of his reports. Indeed we have explained the reasons for defamation previously and have confined them to ten reasons, along with a detailed commentary for each. The purpose here is to mention the words which indicate the different stages according to the ḥadīth masters’ terminology.

For discrediting there are stages. The worst is that word which indicates exaggeration in the matter and features the word in the form of *af‘al*²⁴⁸, like akdhab al-nās (the greatest of the people in lying), or when they say ilayhi al-muntahā fi- al-wad‘ (he is the last word in fabrication), or rukn al-kidhb (the pillar of lying) and its likes. Then [words like] dajjāl (compulsive liar), or waddā‘ (excessive fabricator), or kadhdhāb (excessive liar). [These form the next stage] because even though they contain indications of exaggeration, they are still deemed less than the first stage.

The most lenient words of discrediting is when they say x is layyin (lenient), or sayyi‘ al-ḥifż (bad memory), or fīhi maqāl (in him is dispute). Between the first [which is the worst] stage and the most lenient stage are [further] stages, like their saying matrūk (discarded), or sāqiṭ (dropped), or fāḥish al-ghalaṭ (maker of blatant mistakes), or munkar al-ḥadīth (one whose ḥadīth is rejected), which is more severe in discrediting than when they say ḍa‘īf (weak), or laysa bi-al-qawī (he is not strong), or fīhi maqāl (in him is dispute).

Also important is identifying the stages of accrediting. The highest form is also the one which indicates exaggeration and features the word in the form of ḍaf‘al, like awthaq al-nās (the most reliable of people), or athbat al-nās (the most proven of people), or ilayhi al-muntahā fī-al-tathbīt (he is the last word in dependency). Then [the next stage is] when an attribute of accreditation is stressed, or when then are two attributes [mentioned collectively], like thiqa thiqa (reliable, reliable), thabt thabt (proven, proven) or ‘adl ḍabīṭ (just, accurate) or its likes. The lowest form [of accreditation] are the words which indicate leniency in accrediting, like shaykh, and yurwī ḥadīthuhū (his ḥadīth is reported), yu‘tabaru bihī (he is considered) and its likes. Between these two stages [of the highest and the lowest] are [other] stages.

It is the task of the ḥadīth masters to not only offer an in-depth account of each reporter featured in a ḥadīth, but to term them so that other scholars can readily understand the strength of each person in question. This area is known as marāṭib al-jarḥ wa-al-ta‘dīl, or the stages of discrediting and accrediting which Ibn Ḥajar briefly highlights in this section.

Certainly, this discipline has attracted considerable attention, most of which is contentious. Firstly, Islam warns of the dangers of backbiting and the Qur’ān in fact describes this evil trait synonymous to ‘eating the flesh of one’s dead brother.’\textsuperscript{249} The practice of \textit{al-jarh} \textit{wa-al-ta’ādil} will inevitably include referring to someone with attributes they would condone or deny, which is what backbiting is.

Secondly, the practice of \textit{al-jarh} \textit{wa-al-ta’ādil} seems too subjective. One \ḥadīth master may deem a person credible and appropriate whereas another may have an entirely different opinion of the same person. Is it possible that reporters can unanimously be graded with one particular attribute?

In response, the \ḥadīth scholars however have allowed the practice of \textit{al-jarh} \textit{wa-al-ta’ādil}, purely because it serves a greater good; to protect the sayings of the Prophet from inaccuracy and forgery. Though it may seem unfair to criticise individuals with terms they would disapprove of, the scholars have overlooked this in favour of identifying what can truly be attributed to the Prophet and what cannot. In fact, some have sought to justify \textit{al-jarh} \textit{wa-al-ta’ādil} from the Qur’ān directly, where believers are asked to verify the report of a lewd person when he brings important news.\textsuperscript{250}

Ibn Ḥajār does not offer a comprehensive list of all of the terms used to discredit someone; rather he mentions the worst stage and the subsequent one, and then suffices with a few examples of the most lenient words used to discredit someone. The stages are presented in a table, so that it can be easily compared with Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ’s opinion.

The table highlights the discrepancies in the terms used to grade reporters. According to Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ, matrūk is considered the worse grade of al-jarḥ, whereas Ibn Ḥajar classifies it in the third stage. Similarly, there is no agreement on which stage terms like daʿīf, layyin and kadhdhāb belongs to. Owing to these differences, it is quite possible that a researcher may choose to grade a report higher or lower than he actually is.

Again, there is disagreement over which stage certain terms belong to and an observer will experience considerable difficulties in understanding the grades.

5.63.3. Conclusion.

At the very least, there is a lack of consensus amongst the scholars regarding the terms employed to accredit or discredit someone. In the worse scenario, it can lead to serious confusion. For instance, Yahyā ibn Ma’īn was asked to comment on someone whom he had graded as laysa bihī ba’s (there is no objection with him). He explained that such a comment meant the reporter is deemed thiqa (reliable). According to Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ’s grading, the two comments (laysa bihī ba’s and thiqa) belong to different stages (1986, 124). Similarly, ṣadūq (very truthful) and mahalluhū al-ṣiddq belong to the same stage according to Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ. Al-Dhahabi believes that mahalluhū al-ṣiddq is lesser in rank than ṣadūq. This is because ṣadūq is a noun of exaggeration whereas this quality is not to be found in mahalluhū al-ṣiddq (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 344-5).
Nor are there a set number of stages within either accrediting or discrediting. Al-Dhahabī classified them into four, al-ʻIraqi into five and Ibn Ḥajar into six (al-Suyūṭī 1972, 1: 342).

Additionally, the rating also frequently does not make sense from an Arabic language perspective. For example, akdhab al-nās (the greatest of the people in lying) is deemed worse than dajjāl (the anti-Christ) according to the ḥadīth masters, though linguists may actually deem the latter term as infinitely worse.

The other problem is agreeing on what is considered good grounds to accredit someone or to discredit them. Again, this is a largely subjective exercise. Ibn al-Mubārak believed that – amongst other factors – attendance to congregational prayer was pivotal in establishing a person’s credibility as a ḥadīth reporter (al-Khatibs al-Baghdādī 1988, 79).

Similarly, Yahyā ibn Maʻīn identified four qualities in an acceptable narrator, of which one was ‘refraining from the major sins.’ Depending on which verse is analysed, which prophetic report is viewed and which scholar’s opinion is considered, there can be from seven to seventy major sins. In one ḥadīth for example, we are informed there are seven major sins (polytheism, sorcery, murder, usury, devouring the property of orphans, fleeing from Jihad and slanderous accusations), whereas others include disobedience to parents (Kamali 2005, 86-7).

Then there are the excessive terms have been used within each stage. For instance, thiqā (reliable), mutqīn (firm), thabt (proven), ḥujja, hāfiz and dābit (accurate) are all terms of the highest stage according to Ibn al-Salāḥ. Perhaps it would have been easier for the sake of the researcher if steps had been taken to limit them to just one or two words in each stage. This issue touches on a pattern which is seen elsewhere in the Nuzhah too (and will be discussed in detailed in section six) – that the technical terms in the discipline sometimes did more than just define a type of report. In this section, the excessive terms used within each stage did not add to our clarification in any way, and perhaps made the area more confusing. They may have simply been introduced to give the impression of development and progress in ʻilm al-hadīth, the more terms equalled the more exactitude of the discipline.

In defence of the terming, firstly, one must not forget the richness of the Arabic language which may have played a part in the multiple terms in each stage. The fact that the highest stage of accreditation can be described with so many different terms may simply be down to the vast vocabulary available at the researcher’s disposal. Secondly, Ibn Ḥajar does not venture into the possible geographical reasons behind the vast arrays of terms used within each stage. It may well be that scholars of a certain locality – for example, Madīna – preferred to use thiqā as the highest stage rather than thabt. Nevertheless, whereas a large portion of the field of ʻilm al-hadīth terminology went through a process of harmonisation as the discipline developed, the terms employed in al-jarḥ wa-al-ta’dīl have perhaps not been subject to the same uniformity.

In short, at best the terms give us a good but not a definitive guide to the rank of different reporters. At worst, the vast array of terms used can lead to considerable dispute as to whether someone is fit for reporting or not.
5.64. Other rulings relating to al-jarḥ wa-al-taʿdīl.

These are the rulings pertaining to accrediting and discrediting. I have mentioned [further detail] to complete the benefit and thus I say: the accreditation is accepted from the one who knows the reasons [behind accrediting and discrediting], and not from one who does not know of the reasons. This is to prevent one from accrediting someone from the apparent state without expertise and analysis. [This is the case] even if the accrediting stems from one creditor, according to the most authentic opinion. This [opinion] contrasts with those who specify that the accrediting will not be accepted except from two (men), like it is necessary in a [conventional] testimony. The difference between the two is that accrediting is the same as a ruling (ḥukm) and so therefore there is no condition of numbers for it. [Moreover] the testimony occurs from the witness in the presence of a ruler (ḥākim) [and therefore it is not the same as a ruling] and thus differs.

If it is said to differentiate between when the accrediting in the narrator stems from the creditor’s own independent thought (ijtiḥād) and when it stems from ascribing the accrediting to others, then there is a case [for dispute]. This is because in the first form [where the opinion stems from the creditor’s own independent thought], there is no condition of number, since it is the same as a ruling (ḥukm). If it is the second form [where the creditor ascribes the opinion to another person] then there is a difference of opinion. It is apparent however that in this second form, there is no condition of number. This is because when the core did not require the condition of number, the periphery should not require the condition of number either. And Allāh knows best.\textsuperscript{251}

It is desirable that the discrediting and accrediting is not accepted except from a reliable and acquainted person. Therefore the discrediting is not accepted from one who shows prejudice in the matter and thus criticises the muḥaddith’s ḥadīth with something that does not deserve rejection. Likewise, the accrediting is not accepted from one who relies merely on the apparent state and decrees on this basis. Al-Dhahabī – who is one of the people of outstanding competence in the criticism of men – said:

Two scholars from this discipline have never agreed on deeming a weak reporter reliable and a reliable reporter as weak.

It is for this reason that the position of al-Nāṣa’ī was not to discard the ḥadīth of a man until all the scholars [of this discipline] rejected him.

The agent in this field should be wary of leniency in discrediting and accrediting. This is because if he accredits someone without due care, then it is as if he has affirmed a disapproved ruling. It is then feared such a person will be considered in the group of people who authentically report narrations, though in reality he thinks of the ḥadīth as false. [Conversely] if he discredits someone without precaution, then \textsuperscript{251} If there are disputes, then it centres on how exactly the ḥadīth master reaches his opinion. If he deems someone weak on the basis of his own research and independent thought, then his situation is rather like a judge in a court case: his ḥukm (ruling) will be accepted without a requirement of numbers (al-’Uthaymin 2002, 362). If the ḥadīth master deems someone weak not on the basis of his own analysis, but upon the opinion of scholars prior to him, then this does not resemble a ḥukm (ruling) but ikhbār (informing). In other words, he is merely relaying the opinion of others. According to some scholars, in such a case there must be a minimum of two.

he has inflicted defamation on an innocent Muslim and has coloured him with an evil trait that will remain with him forever.

Prejudice sometimes occurs [in accrediting or discrediting someone] due to ill-behaviour or corrupt motives, [though] the opinions of the earlier scholars is mostly free from this. Sometimes it occurs due to disagreement in Islamic creed, and this is widespread in earlier and later times. It is not desirable to use this [alone] as a means of discrediting; we have previously mentioned the discussion on the narration of an agent of bid'a.

Discrediting is preceded before accrediting and a group [of scholars] have said this is the case unequivocally. However [the correct opinion is that] discrediting is preceded when it is explained in detail from one who knows the reasons of defamation. This is because if the discrediting is without detail, it will not be defamatory in someone whose integrity has been proven. Also, if the discrediting stems from someone who does not the reasons for defamation, it will not be considered.

According to the chosen opinion, if the defamed was void of accreditation before being discredited, then the discrediting will be accepted [when expressed] in a brief form without requiring the reasons for defamation, if the opinion stems from an expert. This is because when he has not been accredited, he is deemed as one whose state is unknown. And [then in such a case] acting upon the opinion of the one who defames [the reporter in question] is better than ignoring the opinion. In this case, Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ has inclined to pausing [on decreeing the state of the reporter].
Commentary

As a detailed addition to the discussion, Ibn Ḥajar refers to certain rulings and principles related to al-jarh wa-al-ta’āl (discrediting and accrediting). In summary, he covers the following important areas;

- Who is permitted to decree whether a reporter is weak or reliable?
- Is the opinion of one expert sufficient to accredit or discredit someone?
- What guidelines should the scholars adopt when accrediting and discrediting someone?
- What is the default state: al-jarh or al-ta’āl?
- What factors sometimes lead to inaccuracy in accrediting and discrediting?

5.64.1. Who is permitted to decree whether a reporter is weak or reliable?

Owing to the importance of the task, Muslim scholars have explicitly suggested that the graders were men of utmost reliability and integrity. We are informed that the task of accrediting or discrediting someone does not fall upon the shoulder of all ḥadīth scholars – rather this duty is confined to the ḥadīth masters who are comprehensively aware of the different stages of narrators, the ranks used in ‘ilm al-ḥadīth terminology to grade reporters and the reasons why a reporter can be discredited. Such masters must be marked by integrity, fairness and must not be known to adopt unjustified leniency (al-‘Uthaymin 2002, 363). Siddiqi notes that of the Companions who became specialists in ḥadīth reporting and ḥadīth criticism, all kept out of politics and thus were un-swayed by political pressure from either the Umayyads or Abbasids. This includes the likes of ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Umar, Ibn ‘Abbās, ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Amr ibn al-‘Āṣ and Abū Dharr (1993, 39).
5.64.2. Is the opinion of one expert sufficient to accredit or discredit someone?

In essence, the opinion of one is sufficient to accredit or discredit someone. This is the position favoured by Ibn Ḥajar, Ṭūlūnī, Ibn al-Ḥājib, al-Hindī and al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādi (al-Munawwī 1999, 2: 358).

The quote from al-Dhahabī on the matter suggests that the hadith masters worked harmoniously with one another. He said:

Two scholars from this discipline have never agreed on deeming a weak reporter reliable and a reliable reporter as weak.

At first sight, the claim seems to suggest that the hadith masters always agreed with one another when declaring the status of a reporter. But the quote merely affirms that they never declared a weak (da’īf) reliable (thiqā) and vice versa. Owing to the contrasting grades within discrediting and within accrediting, this is not difficult to do. Within ta’dīl for example, a person can be thiqā, awthaq al-nās, thābit, ḥāfīz, ḍābit, to mention but a few grades. What al-Dhahabī is claiming is that when declaring the status of one reporter, the hadith masters have always kept within these parameters. What he is not claiming is that when one hadith master declares someone thiqā, all the hadith masters have followed suit and used the same grade for him. This would certainly then be a testimony to the hadith masters’ accuracy and conformity.
Seen in another light, the statement of al-Dhahabī could be interpreted as a sign of a loss of vigour in the discipline. As time went on, ḥadīth masters merely conformed to the opinions given by their predecessors rather than embarking on fresh investigations on any given reporter.

5.64.3. What is the default state: al-jarḥ or al-taʿdīl?

If the situation arises where a particular reporter is accredited by some ḥadīth masters and discredited by others, then the opinion inclining to the reporter’s discrediting will be accepted. However, as Ibn Ḥajar highlights, this is only the case when the master clarifies the reason for his opinion. If he merely deems someone as weak, without offering an opinion as to why, then such a statement carries no value. Al-ʿUthaymin explains why the opinion discrediting the reporter will be preferred:

An example is a man called ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Alī al-Nisābūrī who one of the ḥadīth masters (ḥāŷīz) has criticised as possessing bad memory. None of the other ḥadīth masters have declared him good, or of good memory. Here we accept the opinion of the one discrediting him. Why? Because since no one has accredited him, then his state is deemed majhūl (unknown). So when someone discredits him, it is necessary to accept the opinion, because it is an opinion stemming from someone who has the capability to make such a statement and it does not oppose the opinion of anyone else on that reporter. Therefore we must give the statement consideration (2002, 367).
5.64.4. What factors sometimes lead to inaccuracy in accrediting and discrediting?

Despite an assurance from Ibn Ḥajar that only the most competent and impartial ḥadīth masters are permitted to perform al-jarḥ or al-taʾdīl, he does warn of certain factors which sometimes result in prejudice when declaring the rank of a particular reporter.

Firstly, a reporter is sometimes wrongly aspersed due to corrupt motives, namely that the master has a personal grudge against the reporter he is accrediting or discrediting (al-ʿUthaymin 2002, 366). Ibn Ḥajar believes this is a problem not usually associated with the experts of ḥadīth. However, al-Munāwī writes:

Al-Ḥāfīz Abū ʿAmr ibn ʿAbbās narrates with his chain from Ibn ʿAbbās that he said: ‘Listen attentively to the opinions of the scholars. But do not believe them in opinions of one regarding another… ’ Mālik ibn Dīnār said: ‘The opinions of the scholars and recitation experts are taken in everything except their opinion on each other.’ And in Muʿīn al-ahkām, by Ibn ʿAbd al-Raḥf al-Mālikī, it states: ‘It is not permissible for a scholar to bear testimony on his colleagues. For indeed they are the most severe in terms of envy, hatred and animosity [for one another] (1999, 2: 369).

Later, he cites the opinion of Ibn Daqīq al-ʿĪd who said:
‘The objecting of Muslims to one another is a pit from the pits of the Hell-Fire. Two groups stand on its banks; the muḥaddithūn and the judges (ḥākims)’ (1999, 2: 375).

These two references certainly raise the question whether the opinions of ḥadīth masters should be entirely trusted.

Secondly, and more commonly, a reporter is judged in a prejudiced manner due to differences in doctrine and denomination. This may be where the ḥadīth master belongs to the mainstream sunni denomination and the reporter in question is a shīʿa (al-ʿUthaymin 2002, 366).

Despite these objections, Muslims argue that the large majority of the ḥadīth masters conducted their research with impartiality and religious devotion. Yahyā ibn Saʿīd was on his death-bed when he asked an attendee what the people of Baṣra thought about him. ‘They admire you, but they are only afraid of your criticism of the scholars.’ Yahyā replied: ‘Listen to me. In the Hereafter I would prefer to be opposed by anyone rather than have the Prophet saying: “You heard a ḥadīth attributed to me, and it came to your mind that it was not true but you did not criticise it”’ (Azami 1977, 47).

Despite the best efforts of the ḥadīth masters, the discipline of al-jarh wa-al-taʿdīl has many shortcomings, which have been exposed in classical and modern times. Ibn Ḥajar largely steers clear of such aspects and instead attempts to highlight its worth and validity. Sayyid Aḥmad Khān questions whether a reliable and objective account of reporters can be given, since ‘it is difficult enough to judge the character of living people, let alone those long dead’ (Brown 1999, 98). Opinions as to what exactly constitutes _jarh_ vary from person to person. When al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī learned that someone had discredited a reporter because he urinated in the standing position, he asked why his prophetic reports should be rejected as a result. He informed the imām that the urine would splash onto his clothes and praying in such clothes became questionable. Al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī then asked the man whether he had actually seen the accused in such clothes, to which the man replied ‘no’. Al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī then remarked that a learned man would not discredit another on such weak grounds (Kamali 2005, pp.93-94).

As the above quotes have shown (in 5.64.4.), we can seriously question the worth of the scholars, no matter how esteemed, on what they had to say on fellow colleagues in the field. Broadbridge showed that even Ibn Ḥajar himself had indifferent opinions of his fellow scholars like al-‘Aynī (1999, pp. 99-103). In short, the ḥadīth masters were given the task of accrediting and discrediting the reporters, but who accredits the ḥadīth masters? Certainly, the grading differed from scholar to scholar. While some like Yaḥyā ibn Ma‘īn and Yaḥyā ibn Sa‘īd were strict in their assessment of the reliability of the narrators, others like al-Tirmidhī and al-Ḥākim were not strict (Kamali 2005, 82). In the same way that actual prophetic reports were sometimes subject to forgery, there are not sufficient assurances from Ibn Ḥajar that the biographical reports were immune to forgery. But this shortcoming is not in any way specific to the field of _‘ilm al-ḥadīth_. This is because questions have always been raised whether a science of human behaviour is at all possible. Can we quantify the behaviour of reporters in the same way we can with conforming atoms in a cell, like positivists would perhaps argue? Thus, it could be argued, that early ḥadīth masters – when they cast doubt upon their own opinions on others – were in fact acknowledging that a true science of humans was not possible.

On the other hand, however, one must not ignore the efforts of the ḥadīth masters in attempting to address the important area of reporter credibility. If Ibn Sa’d (d. 230/845) had not compiled the Tabaqāt consisting of the biographical detail of over four thousand reporters, if al-Dhahabī (d. 748/1348) had not investigated the state of eleven thousand individuals in his Mīzān al-i’tidāl and if Ibn Ḥajar had not provided data on fourteen thousand reporters in Lisān al-mīzān, then certainly we would have more reasons to doubt the credibility of prophetic reports. Even the most basic information on reporters, like their birth and death dates, can help us identify whether the isnād is continuous or not and whether a reporter’s claim of hearing a report from a person is feasible or not.

So despite the shortcomings highlighted above, the field of al-jarḥ wa-al-ta’dīl nonetheless is important in sifting the sound reports from the weak. This is because some information about the reporters is better than none at all. What perhaps would be required from the researcher – in order to offset the discrepancies in the grades of accreditation and dis-accreditation and the sometimes unreliable opinions of ḥadīth scholars on colleagues in the field – is reliance on several biographical dictionaries rather than one. This would be instrumental in identifying if the ḥadīth masters had shown partiality based on sectarian or geographical grounds when grading a particular reporter.
5.65. Knowing the paidonymics of the reporters and other related matters.

Important in this field [of ḥadīth] is knowing the paidonymics (kunya) of the named [reporters], from those who are renowned by their names but they have a kunya.

One is not immune from the situation where in some narrations, he is mentioned by his kunya, lest that one assumes he is someone else.252

[Also important in this field is] knowing the names of those called by their kunya.

This is the opposite of the aforementioned case. 253

[Also important in this field is] knowing he whose name is his kunya. Such instances are rare. 254

[Also important in this field is] knowing those reporters in which there is a difference of opinion regarding the kunyas. Such instances are common.

[Also important in this field is] knowing the reporters who have several kunyas, – like Ibn Jurayj; he has two kunyas, Abū al-Walīd and Abū Khālid – or has several descriptions (ṣifā) and several laqabs.

[Also important in this field is] knowing the reporters whose kunya is the same as the name of their father, like Abū Isḥāq Ibrāhīm ibn Isḥāq al-Madani, one of the Successors of the Successors. The benefit of knowing this is to prevent mistakes from one who ascribes it to his father and says: ‘Ibn Isḥāq informed me’ and by 252 The author writes that there are certain cases where a reporter is known by his actual name, though he does a semi-renowned kunya too. It is important to know by his name and his kunya in case he is mentioned by his kunya in a particular report, which may lead to some assuming it refers to another person.

253 This case refers to when a person is usually called by his kunya, rather than his actual name. Again, one must be acquainted with both to ensure the person is not assumed to be two separate individuals.

254 A rare case where this has occurred is Abū Bilāl al-Asḥārī, the son of Abū Mūsā al-Asḥārī (al-Munāwī 1999, 2: 386).
doing so makes an error; the correct form is ‘Abū Ishāq informed me’. The opposite case [should also be known where the name of the reporter is the same as the kunya of the father] like Ishāq ibn Abī Ishāq al-Sabi‘ī.

[Also important in this field is] knowing the reporters whose kunya is the same as the kunya of the wife, like Abū Ayyūb and Umm Ayyūb who are two renowned Companions.255

[Also important in this field is] knowing the reporters whose shaykh’s name corresponds with the father’s name, like ‘Rabī’ ibn Anas, from Anas’. This is how it appears in some narrations. It is assumed [sometimes] that he is reporting from his father, similar to what has occurred in the Ṣaḥīḥ [of al-Bukhārī]: ‘from ‘Āmir ibn Sa’d, from Sa’d’ who is his father. Anas, the shaykh of Rabī‘, is not his father but rather his father is Bakarī and his shaykh is Anṣārī. The aforementioned Rabī‘ is not from his children, [namely Anas ibn Malik’s]. 256

[Also important in this field is] knowing the reporters who are ascribed to someone other than their fathers, like Miqdād ibn al-Aswad. He was ascribed to al-Aswad al-Zuhrī because he was his mutabanna257 though his real name is al-Miqdād ibn ‘Amr.

[Also important in this field is] knowing the reporters who are ascribed to their mothers, like Ibn ‘Ulayya. He is Ismā‘īl ibn Ibrāhīm ibn Miqsam, one of the reliable [reporters]. ‘Ulayya was the name of his mother and he became famous with this

255 Another example is Abū al-Dardā’ and Umm al-Dardā’ (al-Munāwī 1999, 2: 391).
256 The author here gives two examples from parts of a chain. In the first - ‘from ‘Āmir ibn Sa’d, from Sa’d’ which is to be found in the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī - ‘Āmir is the son of Sa’d, from whom he narrated. The second example, ‘Rabī‘ ibn Anas, from Anas’, is not a case of the son narrating from the father. Rabī‘ here narrates from the famous Companion Anas ibn Mālik al-Anṣārī and not his father who is Anas Bakarī. 257 It was common for Arabs to informally adopt someone as their child, which is referred to making one a mutabanna. Islam later put an end to this practice (Qur’ān 33:4).
name. He did not like being called Ibn ‘Ulayya; for this reason, al-Shāfi‘ī would say:

‘İsmā‘īl – who is known as Ibn ‘Ulayya – informed me.’

[Also important in this field is] knowing the reporters who are ascribed to something that does not make apparent sense, like [Khālid] al-Ḥadhadhā’ (shoemaker). Apparently, it seems it is a reference to his manufacturing or business, though this is not the case. Merely, he used to keep the company of shoemakers and so he was ascribed accordingly. Similarly, [the case of] Sulaymān al-Ṭaymī; he was not from [the clan of] Banū Taym but rather resided with them.

Likewise [it is important to know] those who have been ascribed to their grandfather so that confusion does not arise when a person’s name and his fathers is the same as the grandfather’s. 258

[Also important in this field is] knowing the reporters whose own name, father’s name and grandfather’s name are the same, like Ḥasan ibn al-Ḥasan ibn al-Ḥasan ibn ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭalib, may Allāh be pleased with them. Sometimes this similarity of name occurs more frequently, and [thus] is a type of musalsal. 259 Sometimes the name of the reporter and the name of his father is the same as the grandfather’s, like Abū al-Yumn al-Kindī, whose full name is Zayd ibn al-Ḥasan ibn Zayd ibn al-Ḥasan ibn Zayd ibn al-Ḥasan.

[It is important to know the cases where] the reporter’s name coincides with the name of his shaykh and his shaykh’s shaykh upwards, like ‘Imrān, from ‘Imrān from ‘Imrān’. The first is known as ‘Imrān al-Qaṣīr, the second is Abū Rajā’ al-

\[258\] For example, Muḥammad ibn Bishr and Muḥammad ibn al-Sā‘ib ibn Bishr are two, separate individuals. The former is deemed reliable whereas the latter is deemed weak (Anwar 2003, 184).

\[259\] Musalsal is where an attribute is to be found in all or most of the reporters of the chain. It has been discussed in section 5.54.
‘Uṯāridī and the third is Ibn Ḥusayn, the Companion. Likewise is the example of ‘Sulaymān, from Sulaymān, from Sulaymān’. The first is Ibn Aḥmad ibn Abī Ṭabarānī, the second is Ibn Aḥmad al-Wāṣifī and the third is Ibn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Dimishqī, renowned with the name Ibn bint Shuraḥbīl.

Abū Mūsā al-Madīnī has written a comprehensive treatise on this.

[Also important in this field is] knowing the cases where the name of the reporter’s shaykh coincides with the one he reported from. This is a unique form which Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ did not come across. The benefit of knowing this is immunity from assuming repetition or swapping in the chain. From such examples is al-Bukhārī, who narrated from Muslim and also narrated to Muslim. Thus his shaykh is Muslim ibn Ibrāhīm al-Farāḍīsī al-Baṣrī and the one who reported from him is Muslim ibn al-Ḥujjāj al-Qushayrī, compiler of the Ṣahih. The same case occurred for ‘Abd ibn Ḥumayd; he reported from Muslim ibn Ibrāhīm and Muslim ibn al-Ḥajjāj narrated from him in the Ṣahih with this exact chain [featuring the aforementioned Muslim ibn Ibrāhīm al-Farāḍīsī al-Baṣrī]. From this [form] is [also] the example of Yaḥyā ibn Abī Ibn Kathīr. He reported from Hishām and Hishām also reported from him. Thus his shaykh is Hishām ibn ‘Urwa who was from his generation and the one reporting from him is Hishām ibn Abī ‘Abd Allāh al-Dastawā‘ī. From this is also [the example of] Ibn Jurayj; he narrated from Hishām and Hishām reported from him. The higher (shaykh) is Ibn ‘Urwa and the lower (disciple) is Ibn Yūsuf al-Ṣan‘ānī. From this is also [the example of] al-Ḥakam ibn ‘Utabya; he reported from Abū Layla and Abū Layla reported from him. The higher (shaykh) is ‘Abd al-Rahmān and the lower (disciple) is the aforementioned Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Rahmān [al-Dimishqī]. Such examples are plentiful.

Also important to know in this field are the solitary names. A group of scholars have gathered [compilations] on this. Some have compiled them without differentiation, like Ibn Sa‘d in Ṭabaqāt, and Abū Khaythama and al-Bukhārī in their Tārīkh, and Ibn Abī Ḥātim in al-Jarḥ wa-al-taḍīl. From the scholars are those who have singled out the credible [reporters who have solitary names], like ‘Ijlī, Ibn Ḥibbān and Ibn Shāhīn. From the scholars are those who have singled out the defamed [reporters who have solitary names], like Ibn ‘Addī and again Ibn Ḥibbān. From the scholars are those who have singled out the reporters from a specific compilation, like the reporters of al-Bukhārī; done by Abū Naṣr al-Kalābādīh, and the reporters of Muslim; done by Abū Bakr ibn Manjūya, and the reporters of both [al-Bukhārī and Muslim]; done by Abū al-Faḍl ibn Ṭāhir, and the reporters of Abū Dāwūd; done by Abū ‘Alī al-Jayyānī. Likewise the men of al-Tirmidhī and the men of al-Nasā‘ī; which has been done by a number of western scholars, and the men of the six canonical collection – the two Şahīhs, Abū Dāwūd, al-Tirmidhī, al-Nasā‘ī and Ibn Mājā – done by ‘Abd al-Ghanī al-Maqdisī in the book al-Kamāl. This work was then refined by al-Mizzī in Tadhīb al-kamāl. I summarised this work and also added 260 In some scripts, this has been written as ‘Uwayna rather than ‘Utayba.

261 This refers to when reporters are known by a single, solitary name rather than ‘x son of y’ and so on.
many new aspects to it, and I named it Tadhīb al-tadhīb. This is an additional one-third to the original [aforementioned] work.

Also important is to know the unique names. Verily, al-Ḥāfiẓ Abū Bakr Ahmād ibn Hārūn al-Bardījī compiled a work on this. He wrote many things in it which were [later] criticised. From these criticisms is his mentioning Sughdī ibn Sanān, one of the weak reporters. This is with a ḍamma on the šād, changed from a sīn, and with a sukūn on the ghayn, followed by a dāl and a yā’ similar to one used for nasab (affiliation). This is a common [name] and is not unique. For in Ibn Abī Ḥātim’s al-Jarḥ wa-al-ta‘dīl there is a reporter named Sughdī al-Kūfī, who has been deemed credible by Ibn Ma‘īn. Ibn Abī Ḥātim has differentiated between him and [the previously-mentioned] Sughdī ibn Sinān, who he considers as weak. Also, in Tārīkh al-‘Uqaylī there is a Sughdī ibn ‘Abd Allāh who reported from Qatāda. Al-‘Uqaylī said of him: ‘His reports are not preserved.’ I believe it is the same person which Ibn Abī Ḥātim mentioned. As for al-‘Uqaylī and the fact that he mentioned him as one of the weak reporters, it is because of the ḥadīth he reported from him. The weakness is not because of him; rather it is due to the reporter ‘Unaysa ibn ‘Abd al-Rahmān [who is in the isnād]. And Allāh knows best.

From such examples is that of Sandar, on the same template as Ja‘far. He is the mawlā (client) of Zinbā‘ al-Judhāmī, who has companionship [of the Prophet] and narrations [from him]. He is known with the kunya Abū ‘Abd Allāh. This is a unique name not to be found in others according to our knowledge but Abū Mūsā has mentioned in al-Dhayl ‘alā ma‘rifat al-ṣaḥāba by Ibn Manda a reporter called Sandar Abū al-Aswad and has reported a ḥadīth from him. This [opinion of Abū 262 Al-Asmā‘ al-mufrada means names that are rare and are not shared by others.

Mūsā] is refuted by the fact that he is the same Sandar mentioned by Ibn Manda. Muḥammad ibn al-Rabī‘ al-Jīzī has mentioned that same ḥadīth in the historical account of the Companions who took residence in Egypt, under the section mentioning Sandar Mawlā Zinbā’. I have clarified this in my book on the Companions.

Likewise it is important to know the kunyas that are solitary and are unique, as well as knowing the unique laqabs. This sometimes occurs with the name, sometimes with the kunya, sometimes with a defamatory reason – like al-A‘mash\(^{263}\) – and sometimes with the occupation.

Similarly, knowing the nasab\(^{264}\) is important. This sometimes occurs through the tribes – this is more common in the older names than the modern ones – and sometimes through the place; this is more common-practice in the later names than the older ones. Nisba can refer to the town, rural area or temporary residence. It can also occur through occupation, like al-khayyāṭ (tailor) or trade, like bazzār (cloth merchant).

The nasab can be subject to similarity and ambiguity like it does in names. Sometimes the nasab is mentioned as a laqab, like Khālid ibn Makhład al-Qaṭwānī; he was Kūfī and was given the laqab of al-Qaṭwānī which he disliked.

Also important is to know the reasons for the nicknames and nasabs which are contrary to the apparent. Also it is important to know the mawlās (clients) in terms of the higher and lower, by reason of slavery or by reason of clientage through alliance and protection, or by reason of accepting Islam. Both forms are called mawla and one cannot be identified from the other except through contextual evidence.

[Also important in this field is] knowing the brothers and sisters. The classical scholars have compiled works on this, like ‘Ali ibn al-Madini.

This section is largely self-explanatory. Implicitly, what the section does do is perhaps highlight the intended, target-audience for the work. By identifying these different areas which Ibn Ḥajar feels one needs to know, it seems he is offering advice to the young disciples intending to embark on a study of ‘ilm al-hadith for the first time. His intended readership was those students wishing to gain their first insight into the discipline.

The section also reflects the area of ‘ilm al-hadith in particular that Ibn Ḥajar excelled in, which is rijal literature. Not only is this section littered with many examples for each type mentioned, but he often provides additional information on the reporter in question, like his other names, where he resided and from whom he took reports from. There are certain sections that are longer in the Nuzhah owing to their importance. This section could be longer, not because of its importance, but because of the author’s added expertise in it. Inadvertedly, Ibn Ḥajar may have added more detail than he actually thought.

Alternatively, the extensive emphasis on the men in the isnad could be for a religious reason. Ibn Ḥajar wanted to indicate that it is not just the matn which is sought in ‘ilm al-hadith but the men who carry it too. By virtue of carrying the words of the Prophet, these men now carry a spiritual blessing (baraka) that is of value too. This is what led Ibn Wahb to comment that: ‘What we acquired from the mannerisms of Mālik was greater than what we learnt from his knowledge’ (al-Dhahabi 1985, 8: 113).

5.66. Knowing the etiquettes of the shaykh and disciple.

Also important is to know the etiquettes of the shaykh and disciple. Both share the [requirement of] the correct intention, purity from the distractions of the world and sublime morals. The shaykh’s requirement [alone] is that he reports when he is required to do so, he should not report when there is a more senior ḥadīth master in the town but rather should refer [the disciple] to him and he should not refuse to relate prophetic traditions to anyone on the basis of a corrupt intention. [Moreover], he should perform ritual purity (before relating the traditions) and sit with dignity; he should not report whilst standing, whilst in a hurry or in the streets unless he is compelled to. He should resign from reporting when he fears alteration and forgetfulness, due to illness or old-age. When he reports in a gathering using dictation, he should employ an alert mustamlī.266

The disciple’s requirement [alone] is that he respects the shaykh and does not trouble him. He should inform others of what he has learned from the shaykh. He should not cease deriving benefit on the basis of embarrassment or pride. He should accurately record in writing what he has heard and take due care in recording the ḥarakas to it. He should revise the recordings often so it remains rigid in his mind.

266 A mustamlī is employed in a gathering, particularly a large one. Such a person has the task to relay the shaykh’s words to those who cannot hear him directly (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 242).
Commentary

In the introduction of the Nuzhah, Ibn Ḥajar acknowledged the vast contribution of al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī (d. 463/1071) to the field of Ḥadīth. His works such as al-Kifāya on the rules of narration and al-Jāmiʿ li akhlāq al-rāwī wa ādāb al-sāmiʿ on the etiquettes of narration became important, milestone works. Ibn Ḥajar praised him by citing al-Ḥāfiz Abū Bakr ibn Nukta's quote:

Every impartial observer knows that all Ḥadīth scholars after al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī were dependant upon his books.

This small yet informative section on the moral requirements expected from the shaykh and the disciple is based largely – if not exclusively – on the works of al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, thus showing the dependency of later scholars on the works of earlier ones. Ibn Ḥajar touches on just a few expected etiquettes here that al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī otherwise covers in great depth in al-Jāmiʿ. For instance, Ibn Ḥajar writes that both shaykh and disciple require the correct intention; al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī includes a thirteen-page section on this area in al-Jāmiʿ (1996, 1:pp. 123-136). Similarly, the need to adopt sublime morals (1996, 1:215), to respect the shaykh (1996, 1: 271), to listen with the full presence of the heart (1996, 1:354) and to revise the traditions (1996, 1: 363) are all covered in considerable detail in al-Jāmiʿ. So this is the first function of this section; to pay respects to the previous, Ḥadīth masters and their endeavours.
The second function is a religious point; that listening to prophetic traditions and then passing it on to others was seen as a religious exercise, not just an academic or even political one. The Muslims – particularly the early ones – saw indulgence in this discipline as a form of worship. Ḥadīth scholars often cite the example of al-Imām Mālik as most worthy of mention to highlight this point: Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ writes:

When Mālik ibn Anas wanted to transmit prophetic traditions, he used to perform his ablution, sit on the edge of his bed and comb his beard. He sat erect, displaying gravity and reverence and then transmitted. He was asked about that and he replied: ‘I like to honour the ḥadīth of the Messenger of Allāh. I transmit only in the state of ritual ablution and sitting up straight.’ He used to dislike transmitting ḥadīth in the street, while standing or in haste...It is also related that he would perfume his beard before transmitting. If someone raised his voice in his gathering, he would scold them saying: ‘Allāh said [in the Qur’ān], ‘O believers! Do not raise your voice over that of the Prophet.’ 267 Whenever someone raises their voice during the recitation of the ḥadīth of the Messenger of Allāh, it is as if he has raised his voice over that of the Messenger of Allāh (1986, 240).

For Muslims, this attitude to the field was helpful in reassuring their faith in Mālik as a scholar. If he treated in each and every ḥadīth of the Prophet with such care and dignity, it meant he would never include sub-standard and forged reports in his works. On the other hand, a reporter with ill-motives would care less for understanding the words and wisdom of the Prophet. Al-Ḥasan al-Ṭabarī reflected this point when he said:

When a man used to seek knowledge [of ḥadīth] it was apparent in his humbleness, his conduct, his tongue, his sight and in his hands (cited in al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī 1996, 1: 216).

Ibn Ḥajar therefore wanted the Nuzhah to teach new disciples the etiquettes the previous greats adhered to, in the hope they too adopt such morals. In the section on the forged (5.24.), he did openly accept that piety is not a total guarantee of genuineness; after all, some of the worst forgers were the pious Muslims. But this section was important in a religious sense, that learning ḥadīth meant applying its teachings and spiritual dimensions too to one’s faith and character.

5.67. The age of hearing and delivering reports, and the reports of a non-Muslim and a Muslim wrong-doer.

Also important is to know the method of receiving and delivering [the reports]. The most correct opinion on receiving it is at the age of ‘differentiation’. Verily, the muḥaddithūn made it customary to bring their children to the gatherings of ḥadīth and recorded their attendance. It is necessary to seek permission from the shaykh [if the child, after reaching the age of maturity, desires to narrate the reports].

The most correct opinion on seeking ḥadīth himself is that he possesses the ability to do so. The receiving of the non-Muslim is correct too when he delivers it after his Islam. The same therefore applies to the wrong-doer (fāsiq) for sure, when he delivers it after his repentance and his credibility is proven [once again].

As for delivering the ḥadīth, for it has already been mentioned that there is no specific age for it, but instead [the criteria is] his requirement to deliver it and his ability to do so. This (age) differs from person to person. Ibn Khallād said: ‘When he reaches fifty [he is fit to deliver to others] and he cannot be criticised if he does so as forty.’ This has been criticised as Mālik reported before this age.

Commentary

In this small section, Ibn Ḥajar outlines some of the conditions that pertain to the process of taking and delivering prophetic reports. The terms used by the author are tahammul – which means taking the ḥadīth by one of the established means – and adā’, which refers to passing it on to others (Mighālwi 2003, 558). In particular, Ibn Ḥajar refers to three areas; (i) the age of competence for hearing reports (ii) the age when the reporter is fit to 268 Ibn Ḥajar affirms that a non-Muslim can hear prophetic reports before accepting Islam, so long as he delivers them after accepting Faith. For instance, both al-Bukhārī and Muslim have included the report of Jubayr ibn Mut‘im in their Sahīhs, in which he reported that the Prophet would recite Sūrat al-Tāhā in Maghrib prayer. At the time of this actual event, he was a captive from the Battle of Badr (al-Qārī 1994, 796).

269 Once the scholars have accepted the reports of a non-Muslim, there is little room for controversy in accepting the reports of a Muslim who is a wrong-doer, after he repents from his mistakes and his credibility is proven.

270 Ibn Ḥajar cites the opinion of Ibn Khallād, who believed the age was forty or fifty. Perhaps he is implicitly referring to the Qur’ānic verse where the age of forty is referred to as the age of ‘full strength’ (46:15). But again, Ibn Ḥajar states that owing to the different ability of people, a definitive age cannot be set. He then reminds the reader that Mālik ibn Anas was delivering prophetic reports at a very younger age; according to Ibn al-S̱āhlī, at the age of seventeen (1986, 237). Ibn al-Ṣ̱ālah too seems to agree that setting an exact age is difficult when he writes: ‘There used to be disagreement over the age when it becomes suitable for a transmitter to take up teaching hadīth and to be appointed to relate them. Our view is that when the need arises for the hadīth in his possession, it becomes desirable for him to take up relating and spreading them, no matter what his age his...There is nothing wrong with his transmitting at forty because that is the threshold of maturity and the zenith of perfection. The Messenger of Allāh was informed of his mission when he was forty. At forty, a person’s resolution and strength reach their peak and his intellect becomes abundant and his judgement is improved’ (1986, 236-8). pass it on to others (iii) and whether the reports of a non-Muslim and a Muslim wrongdoer are accepted. Owing to the controversy surrounding the age of competence, it is certainly worthy of more analysis.

5.67.1. The age of competence for hearing reports.

In order to listen to prophetic reports, it seems that the many scholars seem to suggest that a reporter can be very young in order to fulfill this task. Al-Qārī writes that al-Īsḥābānī\footnote{Al-Ḥāfīz Abu Muḥammad Abd Allāh ibn Muḥammad al-Īsḥābānī.} himself explains that he memorised the Qur’ān by the age of five. When he was just four, he was taken to the ḥadīth gathering of Abū Bakr al-Muqrī. Some attendees objected to his presence. Abū Bakr al-Muqrī asked him to recite Sūrat al-Ḡāfrūn which he did so without error. Al-Muqrī allowed him to remain in the gathering and took responsibility for his presence (al-Qārī 1994, 793). Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī writes that a child is permitted to learn prophetic reports once he can differentiate between a cow and a donkey (1988, 64).

Perhaps with such cases in mind, Mīghālwī and al-Munāwī have suggested that the person can be as young as five (2003, 559 & 1999, 2: 424) and implicitly, al-Bukhārī believes this age is suitable. This is because under the chapter ‘When it is legitimate to allow the minor to listen’ (al-Munāwī 1999, 2: 424-5), he includes the report of Maḥmūd ibn al-Rabī, who was four or five at the time when he heard traditions. Certainly, Ibn Ḥājar too suggests a young age when he points out that ḥadīth scholars would bring their young children to such gatherings and then ensure their presence was formally recorded.
However, allowing the hearing of reports at such a young age is not without its problems. Firstly, it seems strange that a Muslim is not required to perform the obligatory prayers until the age of puberty, yet he is permitted to listen to prophetic reports. Secondly, there is a substantial difference between hearing reports and understanding them. For instance, Abū Mūsā al-‘Anazī once said:

We are a privileged tribe. We are from ‘Anaza. The Prophet ﷺ read towards us (Mīghālwī 2003, 467).

Abū Mūsā thought the report meant that the Prophet prayed for their tribe. In fact, ‘Anaza is a spear. The Prophet ﷺ read Ṣalāḥ with a spear in front so people could pass by ahead of him. If grown men can make such mistakes, then children certainly can.

Thirdly, it is also doubtful that children can fully appreciate the task they are involved in and subsequently display maturity. Al-Qārī mentions how one child was bought to the gathering of Ma’mūn. He recited the Qur’ān when requested but he would cry when he felt hungry (1994, 793).

Fourthly, the customary order of seeking Islamic education does not begin with listening to prophetic reports but in fact commences with mastery in other fields. ‘Abd Allāh al-Zubayrī disliked disciples seeking ḥadīth before the memorisation of the Qur’ān and before studying the farāʾid (al-Qārī 1994, 792). Azami notes that after the Qurʾān, students were expected to gain expertise in ‘Islamic Law, religious practices and grammar’ before indulging in ḥadīth studies, typically at the age of twenty (1977, 23). Al-Thawrī went as far as to suggest that a person should ‘worship Allāh for twenty years’ before seeking ḥadīth (al-Qārī 1994, 792-3). Ibn Ḥajar’s own experience also points to this very fact. Before embarking on ḥadīth studies, he memorised the Qurʿān, followed by studies in jurisprudence, Arabic and mathematics. He studied the Mukhtaṣar of Ibn al-Hājib on usūl and took lughā from al-Fīrūzabādī (Ahmadayn 1958, 9; al-Wajīdī 1996, 13). In short, there are a number of disciplines that must precede ḥadīth studies in order for a disciple to fully comprehend the words and actions of the Prophet. By allowing children as young as five to attend ḥadīth circles, it either means the child must have studied disciplines like fiqh and Qurʿān before this, or the child simply did not study them at all.

Fifthly, we learn that seeking ḥadīth at a small age resulted in some reporters being branded weak. Azami notes that the likes of ‘Amr al-Bayrūtī and Hishām ibn Ḥassān were considered weak precisely because they took their reports from their teachers at too young an age (1977, 23).

Sixthly, it could be argued that socially, ḥadīth gatherings were the place to be seen. People attached significance to scholarly circles, and tried to add to their rank in society by taking their children to such gatherings. Al-Zuhrī (d. 124/742), for example, noted that the youngest student he came across was Ibn ‘Uyayn, who was fifteen years old. Al-Thawrī (d. 161/777) identified twenty as the ideal age for commencing ḥadīth studies (Azami 1977, 23). But as time progressed, these restrictions were lifted so that infants could attend these gatherings. By the late second century, people brought their children to these circles for the social benefits rather than its academic one. This partially explains why Ibn Ḥajar wrote ‘the muḥaddithūn made it customary to bring their children to the gatherings of ḥadīth and recorded their attendance.’ Actually understanding the reports from the shaykh was preceded by a desire to simply be counted as members of an elite, scholarly circle. This bizarre situation reached its peak when, as Azami notes, ‘the attendance of a child to such lectures entitled him to a certificate which gave the name of the child, if he was under five, as proof that he attended the lectures’ (Azami 1977, 23). Despite all of these points, it must be noted that Ibn Ḥajar steers clear from explicitly stating a minimum age. Rather, he states that the person must be at a stage of tamyīz, or ‘differentiation’. In essence, this means that the reporter must be at such an age where he now possesses sound intellect and understanding, by which he can clearly differentiate between right and wrong. Moreover, it means he is at a stage where he can differentiate between the words of the Prophet and ordinary, everyday talk and is able to record the shaykh’s words, either through memory or written records (Mīghālī 2003, 559).

To evaluate the debate, it is clear that in order to avoid controversy and in order to reflect the importance of the hearing prophetic reports, it is perhaps better to analyse each individual case, rather than state a particular age at which he can attend ḥadīth gatherings. Al-Munāwī indicates towards this opinion when he writes:

> When the person can understand dialogue and can reply competently, then his listening to ḥadīth is correct, even if he is at an age less than five. And if he does not possess such qualities, then his listening is not correct, even if he is fifty (1999, 2: 425).

In other words, the minimum age debate should be deemed a relative exercise.
The scholars (such as al-Qārī and al-Bukhārī) who wished to highlight the certain cases where children of a very young age were listening to prophetic reports chose abnormal and exceptional cases. Otherwise for the majority of periods and places, the thought of five-year olds sitting in ḥadīth circles was un-entertained.

In defence of the ‘social circle’ debate mentioned earlier, Azami notes that the awarding of certificates to five year olds was not as bizarre as it seems, and in fact served an important purpose. He writes:

> The main use of this certificate was to mark the purity and authenticity of the text itself. The graduate’s name was put in the certificate of reading which was not written on a sheet of paper but either on the margin of the book or at the end of the book. After growing up, he was not entitled to read any copy of the same book. No, he must read from the same manuscript or from a copy transcribed from the book which bore his name and which was checked carefully. Therefore by this very mean, the scholars were able to safeguard the purity of the text while keeping the isnād ‘ālī, that is, the least number of scholars between the reader and the Prophet (1977, 24).

This shows that the attendance of the infants was to protect the texts rather than teach the children at that age. The attendance of infants served another purpose too, to keep the chain as short with fewer intermediaries as possible. This proves that actually understanding the reports was not the purpose for these infants.
To conclude, Ibn Ḥajar’s Nuzhah is in places timeless. He provides a clear definition and example which makes sense for all readers in all ages. Other sections are influenced heavily by the nature of ḥadīth activity of his time. This section falls under the latter. We know this because the young age of students that were coming to ḥadīth circles was a problem during his time (something which will be analysed in detail in chapter six). In this exact section, he also highlights whether the report of a non-Muslim is accepted. This too was a product of his era. Ibn Ḥajar’s student al-Sakhāwī noted that non-Muslims attended the recitation of texts and their names were recorded with the Muslim auditors in the hope they would one day accept Islam (Dickinson 2002, 503). So the Nuzhah, as far as this section is concerned, is largely a product of its time.

5.68. Knowing the method of writing and recording.

Also important is to know the method of writing the correct letterings in the book, and the method of recording it in it. This is that he writes the ḥadīth clearly and with explanation, adding the ḥarakat to the difficult words and the dots. The remaining text [when something has been missed] should be written on the right-hand margin as long as there is space to do so; otherwise on the left margin.

He should know the correct means of presentation; this is reading the written text to the shaykh, or with a reliable person or with himself bit by bit.

He should know the correct way of listening to reports, in that he does not occupy himself with matters that distract him, like copying, talking and tiredness.
Commentary

Ibn Ḥajar tenders simple yet informative advice to the disciple on how exactly to record the traditions he has heard from the shaykh. This includes writing the full vocalisation on the words, particularly the difficult ones, revising the texts and expressing full awareness when listening to the shaykh. If the Nuzhah felt the need to ask students to avoid distraction whilst listening to reports, then perhaps this is something which was a problem during that particular period. Makdisi writes that because the ḥadīth classes were more crowded than fiqh ones, and because some students could copy the dictations to paper quicker than others, distraction became a marked feature of ḥadīth gatherings (1985, 115).

5.69. Travelling in pursuit of ḥadīth.

Also important to know is the attributes of traveling for ḥadīth, in that the disciple commences with the reports of his town and encompasses them all, then travels to acquire that which he does not already have. His desire for excessive reports should outweigh his desire for excessive shaykhs.

Commentary

272 Interestingly, Ibn Ḥajar offers specific advice in that omitted comments should be added to the right hand margin, and should only be written on the left if there is no space on the right. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ elucidates: ‘The preferred method of including textual omission in the margins is for the student to make a line going up from the spot of omission in the line of text and then curve it for a short distance between the two lines of text in the direction of the spot in the margin where he will write the addition….let that be in the right margin’ (1986, 193-4).

The advice to insert the addition on the right-hand margin can be interpreted in two ways; firstly, it may simply be a reference to the Islamic teaching which encourages Muslims to prefer the right over the left in their affairs. Secondly, as al-‘Uthaymin notes, it perhaps is because writing on the left may be unclear, owing to the middle binding and stitching of the book (2002, 383).
As the Nuzhah draws to an end, Ibn Ḥajar reminds disciples that part of the expected etiquettes from the ḥadīth master is to possess a real and lasting desire to seek knowledge from all the shaykhs available to him at his disposal. In a short paragraph of only a few words, the Nuzhah indicates that traveling is important and also warns of the danger and pitfalls associated with it. In this sense, Ibn Ḥajar’s description is very accurate, because in reality traveling served good purposes as well as bad ones.

Religously, rihla was important for Muslims. The Prophet amply highlighted the importance of knowledge and the need for Muslims to gain it from all possible persons and places (Goldziher 1971, 165). To hear prophetic reports first hand was also an important reason for Muslims to travel. If a disciple wished to seek an ‘elevated’273 isnād for a ḥadīth that he already possessed, then he was encouraged to travel (al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī 1988, 2:333). Abū Ayyūb, for example, travelled from Madīna to Egypt in order to refresh his memory of a ḥadīth which he had already heard directly from the Prophet (Ṣīdqi 1993, 40). Jābir ibn ‘Abd Allāh travelled for an entire month to Syria for the sake of one ḥadīth (al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī 1988, 2: 336-7, Pīr Karam Shah 1973, 122).

In both cases, they could have perhaps heard the same report indirectly from the locals. However, they chose to make the journey in order to hear the report first-hand.

There are no shortages of such eager-travellers. In fact, many became known precisely for their extensive travels. Masrūq (d. 63/682) ‘travelled so widely for the sake of learning that he was known as ‘Abū al-Safar’” (Ṣīdqi 1993, 41).

The Nuzhah indicates the darker side of travelling too. The author warns that disciples should seek knowledge, not a reputation. Travelling merely for the sake of travelling and an interest in accumulating shaykhs rather than reports is fruitless. On this basis, he advises the disciple not to travel until he has heard from the shaykhs that reside in his own town. Also, his aim should be amassing different reports rather than amassing a reputation of having heard from a variety of sources. Al-‘Uthaymin explains:

> Some people have an interest in boasting that ‘I have heard from the scholars of Makka’ or ‘I have heard from the scholars of Cairo’. They begin to compete with one another in numbers and in who has heard from the furthest place. This is a great error on their part (2002, 375).

The early Muslim scholars certainly did learn from a variety of sources and places. Ibn al-Mubārak (d. 181/797) had 1,100 teachers, Mālik ibn Anas had nine-hundred and Hishām ibn ‘Abd Allāh leant from 1,700 teachers (Siddiqi 1993, 41). But for most part, their primary intention was to seek knowledge, not to boast about the number of shaykhs they acquired knowledge from. Of later generations, the same cannot be guaranteed. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī lambasted those who travelled but had no desire to learn and appreciate the Prophet’s message (1988, 3). Others who possessed exotic reports made a paying business out of eager travellers who came to hear such reports (Goldziher 1971, 169). In short, travelling became a mere sport.

In the ninth Islamic century, was there still any function behind travelling? Like many great scholars, Ibn Ḥajar himself travelled extensively to learn. For instance, he travelled to Damascus and Jerusalem, where he studied under the likes of Shams al-Dīn al-Qalqashandī (d. 809/1406) and Badr al-Dīn al-Bafīṣī (d. 803/1400), as well as Yemen.
Up until the sixth century, disciples of ḥadīth did have to travel extensively but the appearance of new high schools for ḥadīth put that to an end. Dār al-ḥadīth Nurīyya was established in Damascus by Nūr al-Dīn Mahmūd ibn Abī Saʿīd Zengī (d. 569). This led to the establishment of similar schools elsewhere in the Muslim world (Goldziher 1971, 174).

To conclude, riḥla is an area where there was a convergence of views from Ibn Ḥajar and Goldziher more than perhaps anywhere else. But by citing the example of Aḥmad ibn Mūsā al-Jawāliqī, even Goldziher acknowledged the dedication and sincerity which drove these narrators:

Aḥmad ibn Mūsā al-Jawāliqī from Ahwāz (210-306), usually known as ‘Ābdān, travelled to Başra every time he heard of a tradition transmitted by Ayyūb al-Sakhtiyānī, in order to obtain these traditions from men who gathered them immediately at the source. Altogether he made that journey eighteen times (1971, 167).

Elsewhere, he observes how riḥla served corrupt purposes. In the Nuzhah, Ibn Ḥajar follows a similar argument. He reminds readers of its importance and warns against the pitfalls associated with it.

5.70. Types of ḥadīth compilations.

Also important to know is the types of compilations. This can either be in [the form of] musnads, in that the compiler gathers the reports of each Companion individually. If he wishes he can then arrange them according to their precedence [to Islam], or if he wishes, he can arrange them alphabetically, which is then easier for reference purposes. Or [the compilation can be done] in chapters of jurisprudence or its like, in that he gathers all the reports that affirm or negate a certain principle. It is better to suffice on that which is deemed as šāḥīḥ and ḥasan: if he does include all, then he should explain the reason for the [inclusion of] weak reports.

Or [the compilation can be done] through the means of ‘īlal. He mentions the matn with its path, along with the different variations [of the isnād]. It is best to arrange them according to chapters so that it is easier for reference purposes.

Or [the compilation can be done] through the means of atrāf: here he mentions part of the ḥadīth which is [sufficient] to indicate the remainder, and then gathers the isnāds for it, either comprehensively or particular for specific books.

Commentary

In the penultimate discussion, Ibn Ḥajar outlines the different forms the compilation of ḥadīth can take on. This includes: (a) musnad274 (pl. masānīd), sunan275 (pl. sunna),

274 This is a compilation where the reports are gathered and arranged according to the top narrator, namely the Companion (al-Munāawi 1999, 1:442) and can take on two contrasting forms, which Ibn Ḥajar clearly highlights in the above text. Goldziher writes that this type of compilation is better suited for ‘an individual achievement, a repertory for private use’ (1971, 214). This therefore suggests that this not ideally suited for public use.

275 This is where the compilation is according to the topic of the ḥadīth’s text. In other words, all reports relating to Prayer are recorded in one chapter, all the reports on ablution in a separate chapter and so on. The Six Canonical Collection are all arranged in this format, with only slight differences in methodology. Because the nature of such a compilation is also useful in acting as a book of jurisprudence, Ibn Ḥajar writes that the compiler should try to avoid weak reports in such a compilation. This is because a da‘īf ḥadīth cannot be used to prove or disprove principles relating to shari‘a. If he does include them, then he must clearly label them as weak, and inform the reader the reason behind its inclusion.
‘ilal’ (pl. ‘illa) and atrāf (pl. ʿ taraf). Ibn Ḥajar only mentioned these four types of compilations, though other forms do exist. The most common forms are: jāmiʿ (pl. jawāmiʿ) 278, muʿjam (pl. maʿājim) 279, juzʿ (pl. ajzāʾ) 280, mustadrak, mustakhraj 281 and ṣahīfa. This last type refers to collections marking the earliest period of ḥadīth documentation. At this stage, reports were simply put together in writing. Primarily, such works pertain to the Prophet’s lifetime until the second Islamic century (Kamali 2005, 31). The authenticity of such works can be viewed in two contrasting manners. Firstly, they can be viewed reliable because they originated from such an early period. Secondly, they can be seen as suspect because of the absence of proper chains for them.

276 This is a less-established way of compiling prophetic reports. It involves recording the reports that have some form of hidden weakness in them. Having mentioned the text of the ḥadīth and the various chains pertaining to it, the compiler then explains the reasons behind the weakness in them (Anwar 2003, 197). Al-ʿUthaymin writes that one benefit of such a form of compilation is to allow disciples to systemically study reports that contain hidden weaknesses, and understand the reasons behind their rejection (2002, 387). Works in this format include the compilations of ʿAhmad ibn Hanbal, al-Dāraqtūnī and Ibn Abī Ḥattīm (Ahmadayn 1958, 92).

277 Literally, this means ‘part’. It is where the compiler does not mention the full ḥadīth but instead abbreviates it to a shortened form. This abbreviation is then sufficient to allow the reader to understand which particular ḥadīth is being referring to.

278 This is where the compiler includes chapters on areas pertaining to Islamic doctrines, worship, dealings, moral and social teachings, the exegesis of the Qurʾān, the biography of the Prophet, the virtues of esteemed individuals, calamities and events relating to the Day of Judgement (Ṭaḥḥān 2001, 129; al-Munāwī 1999, 1:442). The most famous example of such is the al-Jāmiʿ of al-Bukhārī. The difference between this type of compilation and sunan is that the latter usually concentrates on shariʿa rulings, to the exclusion of areas such as Islamic doctrines and the virtues of esteemed individuals.

279 This is where the compiler arranges the book in order of the names of his shaykhs, usually in alphabetical order (Ṭaḥḥān 2001, 129). The most famous example is the Muʿjams of Ṭabarānī – al-Kabīr, al-Awsat and al-Ṣaghīr.

280 This refers to smaller compilations where the compiler has recorded all the reports of one narrator, or has gathered all the reports on a particular topic area (Ṭaḥḥān 2001, 129). An example is al-Bukhārī’s small treatise on raising the hands in Prayer.

281 Works on ḥadīth literature have sometimes taken on the forms of mustadrak and mustakhraj. The former is where the author includes reports that meet the conditions set down by an existing author – for example, al-Bukhārī – into a new compilation which the original author missed, such as the works of Ḥākim on the two Ṣaḥīḥs (Ṭaḥḥān 2001, 129). A mustakhraj is where the author compiles the same reports mentioned by the original author, but with a different chain leading to the text. For example, the work of Abū Nuʿaym al-Īṣbahānī on the two Ṣaḥīḥs is in this format.
5.70.1 Conclusion.

The section is a simple and useful account for ḥadīth disciples, informing them what type of collections they are likely to come across and what benefit they can derive from them. Where this chapter appears in the Nuzhah is also crucial: as his own book on ‘īlm al-ḥadīth concludes, Ibn Ḥajar introduces other works of ḥadīth for the disciple to explore. This section is therefore a transitional introduction to the next steps in ḥadīth studies which the disciple should embark upon.

Despite its apparent simplicity, the section does raise important points. Firstly, Ibn Ḥajar only mentions four types of collections and does not, for example, touch upon ṣaḥīḥas. The fact that he chose to dismiss this type may be read as an indication that he does not consider the authenticity of this type, perhaps because they lack proper chains. Secondly, Ibn Ḥajar does not offer an historical account of how sunan and jāmi’ collections came about, which would have been most useful. Muslims would argue that after the musnads, the sunans and jāmi’ s were a natural progression. The extent of the ḥadīth literature available in the third century meant it was now possible to categorise them into different chapters in an all-binding treatise on the sunna of the Prophet. This view contrasts with that of Goldziher. He writes that the muṣannaf type of collections were preceded by works such as the Muwaṭṭa’ which depended on ra’y (opinion) more than ḥadīth material. Al-Bukhārī and other members of the aṣḥāb al-ḥadīth needed to ‘point to the importance of the ḥadīth for religious and legal practice and to bring practical proof that every chapter of the fiqh could be filled with clear ḥadīth material.’ (Goldziher 1971, 216). As evidence, he notes that al-Bukhārī depended almost entirely on ḥadīth rather than ra’y, the latter being more prevalent in Mālik’s work (1971, 216).
Moreover, the first musannaf originated from Iraq, ‘where the theoretical conflict was most violent’ (ibid).

Thirdly, the text of the Nuzhah indicates that these types of compilations are for reference and research purposes available to the disciple. Ibn Ḥajar is not advocating the production of new material. The proof for this is the fact that he mentions sunan. As a form of compilation, this had ceased five hundred years earlier and no new work appeared thereafter. Goldziher comments:

The science of tradition also past its prime with its first classics. With the closing of that literature which we have just described as the canonical one, boundless compilation began to gain ground. It is true that ḥadīth literature in its very nature could be little else but the fruit of collection and compilation. (1971, 246)

In fact many of Ibn Ḥajar’s countless literary works were in reality improvements, completions (takmila) and additions to famous, existing works. Al-Matālib al-‘āliya min riwāyat al-masānīd al-thamāniya was a work compiled by him that merely gathered the reports of eight famous musnad collections. Al-Qārī, who himself wrote a commentary of the Nuzhah, notes that a large bulk of Ibn Ḥajar’s works were nothing but completions. Fath al-bārī bi sharḥ saḥīḥ al-Bukhārī too is a case in point; it is but a commentary on an existing work.

So whilst this section can be seen as a useful guide to further reading and research in the field of ḥadīth, it also serves as a grim reminder of the academic drought that had set in by the time Ibn Ḥajar appeared in the ninth Islamic century.
5.71. The reasons behind the ḥadīth.

Also important is to know the reasons of ḥadīth. On this, the shaykh of al-Qâḍî Abû Ya‘lā ibn al-Farrā’ al-Ḥanbâlî has compiled a book, namely Abû Ḥafṣ al-‘Ukbarî.

Shaykh Taqî al-Dîn ibn Daqîq al-‘Id said that some scholars of his generation began writing on this topic area, perhaps because they were unaware of Abû Ḥafṣ al-‘Ukbarî’s existing work.

Commentary

In theory at least, knowing the reason why prophetic reports came about is of paramount importance for Muslims. Firstly, it could assist in dispelling any doubts about the authenticity of a ḥadīth. Not only would Muslims possess the saying of the Prophet, but they would be aware of the events that perhaps led up to the saying. Using sīra literature, the events and the characters involved could be verified. For example, the famous report ‘Actions are merely judged by intention’ stems from a story where a Companion wished to migrate to Madina to marry a woman rather than to seek the reward of migration for the sake of Islam (al-Suyūṭî 1972, 2: 394). Knowing the name of the man and woman involved in the story would certainly add weight to the authenticity of the story and the actual ḥadīth.

Secondly, knowing the background to the ḥadīth can help us to overcome sectarian differences between Muslims. The ḥadīth ‘He for whom I am his master (mawlā), then ‘Alî is his master’ is such an example.²⁸²

²⁸² The Shi‘as maintain that this prophetic report is the basis for the Imāmate of ‘Alî after the demise of Muhammad. They cite the opinion of Ibn ‘Abbâs that Allâh ordered the Messenger to openly publicise the caliphate of ‘Alî. The Prophet was [supposedly] scared that people would criticise him for handing Thirdly and perhaps most importantly, it would help Muslims to defend the charge from western observers that ḥadīth criticism ignored the matn almost entirely. Schacht, for instance, noted that ‘the criticism of traditions as practiced by Muhammadan scholars was almost invariably restricted to a purely formal criticism of isnāds on these lines’ (1959, 3). Studies on the background to how a ḥadīth came about would help refute this charge, and show the sceptics that Muslims treated the matn with equal regard as the isnād.

But having said this, this short section in the Nuzhah implicitly suggests that knowing the reasons behind the report was not particularly important to Ibn Ḥajar. No explanation is offered as to how this can help with the study of ḥadīth. No examples are offered either. Rather he simply refers to the existing literature on the topic area. Certainly, the practice of investigating the reason behind the ḥadīth has not received the same focus employed leadership to such a close tie of his. So Allāh revealed the verse ‘O Messenger! Proclaim the message that has been sent down to you from your Lord. And if you do not, then you have not conveyed His message (5:67) on the day of Ghadīr Khumm, after which the Prophet took the hand of ‘Ālī and proclaimed: ‘He for whom I am his master (mawlā), then ‘Ālī is his master (Ālusī, Part VI, 193). The Sunnis give a very different background to this ḥadīth. The Prophet was told that some Muslims had criticised the heavy-handedness of ‘Ālī in Yemen. Yazīd ibn Ṭalḥa reports that when ‘Ālī was returning from Yemen to meet the Prophet in Makka, he wanted to meet the Prophet urgently and so he parted from his caravan and made one man the deputy of the group. This man adorned each person a garment that belonged to ‘Ālī. When ‘Ālī met up with the group once more nearer to Makka, he saw the garments. ‘Ālī asked: ‘What is the reason behind these garments?’ The man replied: ‘I adorned the people with this so they would look good when the people greet them.’ ‘Ālī ordered them to remove the garments before the Prophet reached them. So they removed the garments. In defence of ‘Ālī, the Prophet said these words to show his support to him. This was on the eighteenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah. (Ālusī, Part VI. p. 193.) Support for this version is to be found in the Musnad of Ahmād, from Ibn ‘Abbās, from Burayda al-Aslamī that:

‘I took part in the military expedition with ‘Ālī in Yemen, where I witnessed his heavy-handedness. Thus when I came to the Prophet I mentioned ‘Ālī and somewhat belittled him. I saw the face of the Prophet change colour as he remarked: ‘O Burayda! Am I not the closer to the believers than their own selves?’ I said: ‘Of course O Messenger of Allāh!’ He then said: ‘He for whom I am his master (mawlā), then ‘Ālī is his master.’ (Musnad Ahmād. The Ahadīth of Burayda al-Aslamī, Hadīth no. 21867) This is further supported by the report of Zaynab bint Ka‘b – who was with Abū Sa‘īd al-Khudrī – from Abū Sa‘īd that:

‘The people complained about ‘Ālī. So the Prophet stood amongst the people ordering the people not to complain about him.’ (Ālusī, Part VI, p. 194) These authentic reports clearly show that background to the famous saying ‘He for whom I am his master (mawlā), then ‘Ālī is his master’ was the events of Yemen.
by the scholars on the Qur’ān (al-‘Uthaymin 2002, 389). There are several works compiled by early scholars that examine the reason and story behind the revelation of certain verses in the Qur’ān, called asbāb al-nuzūl.

The fact that Ibn Ḥajar largely dismissed the reasons behind the ḥadīth may be simply because of the nature of the Nuzhah. If this manual was indeed aimed at disciples embarking on the study of ḥadīth for the first time, then the basic classification and grading of ḥadīth is more important than knowing the reasons behind it. The latter is investigated and studied after a student has grasped the fundamentals. Or to use the correct terminology, students needed to fathom ḥadīth riwāya before dirāya.

Alternatively, Ibn Ḥajar did not give this section extensive coverage because of the lack of interest in it in his time. Muslims were not interested with the details of the ḥadīth and its background. They were more interested in elevation and the prestige attached to ḥadīth gatherings.

The scholars have compiled works on most of the types that we have touched upon in this concluding [section]. We have merely introduced the types by defining them and have not given their examples. Including them all [in this work] is difficult. Therefore, one should refer to the more comprehensive treatises in order to understand their true reality.

Ibn Ḥajar asks the reader here to extend his sights to the countless books and treatises that have been written specifically on the areas covered in the concluding section of his own works. Owing to the difficulty in highlighting them all with examples, he writes that he has defined each type briefly, and that readers who require a fuller explanation should refer to these works. For example, Ibn Ḥajar swiftly refers to the need for the disciple to travel for the sake of ḥadīth in a few lines. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī has written an entire book on this subject, entitled Al-Rihla fī ṭalab al-ḥadīth.\textsuperscript{283} Again this implicitly suggests that the Nuzhah acts as an introduction to the discipline of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth, rather than the final word.

6.0. The Findings.

In this thesis, I have presented a lucid translation of the Nuzhah, coupled with a detailed and original commentary. Despite my sincere efforts, I acknowledge that there is a wealth of material that has been neglected in this study, from both Muslim scholars and non-Muslim ones. This has mainly resulted because of the limitations in terms of the length of the thesis.

However, I believe the analysis has gone some distance in offering an original and useful way of viewing the discipline of ‘ilm al-hadīth. In particular, there are certain general findings that have become apparent in the course of the thesis. In brief, these findings and reflections will be mentioned below. I have expressed these findings at the end of the thesis because many of them relate to different areas of the discipline, not just one.

Therefore it made sense to express them collectively once an overview of the entire Nuzhah had been presented. Collectively, these findings indicate why an appreciation of the Nuzhah was so important. Ibn Hajar’s work can be viewed as merely a simple manual on ‘ilm al-hadīth. But these points show that the work can be interpreted as an important work that still has significance in today’s academic field.
6.1. Matn criticism.

By observing Ibn Ḥajar’s Nuzhah, one can allude to the general criticism that has always haunted the discipline; that ḥadīth criticism is largely focussed on the isnād to the exclusion of the matn. In the Nuzhah, this is apparent in many ways. The conditions of a ṣaḥīḥ report (section 5.9.) largely centre on the men transmitting the report, not the actual message itself. The rejected traditions are such because, as Ibn Ḥajar identifies, there is a drop in the isnād or some defaming attribute in the reporter (section 5.17.). In section 5.11., Ibn Ḥajar refers to *shādhdh al-*isnād but totally avoids a mention of *shādhdh al-*matn. Of the seventy-two sections in the Nuzhah, only two can be viewed as being entirely matn-centred, muḥkam (5.14) and the reasons behind the ḥadīth (5.71). The lack of matn criticism is perhaps the primary reason why the likes of Muir dismissed the methods of early ḥadīth criticism methods (1858: lxxxvii). To many western observers, the absence of attention given to the text gives the impression that the early ḥadīth masters’ methodology was not entirely adequate.

However, there is a limit, religiously, to how far matn criticism can go, and in my opinion, that is why the Muslims did not indulge in it too much. They faced a very serious dilemma; to what extent could they decide whether the Prophet’s words were ‘contrary to reason’ or not? Under which criteria could they assess the possibility of the words emitting directly from the Prophet? Owing to the Prophet’s rank, who were the humble Muslims to decide whether the matn was worthy of acceptance or not? Certainly Muslims are encouraged to resort to their own reason, but does this extend to the Holy Prophet too?
In a field where seniority means so much, which Muslim would want to question the Prophet’s gilt-edged words?

A prime example of the difficulty in matn criticism is the ‘laughing in Prayer’ report. Ṭabarānī reports that after some Companions laughed loudly in congregational prayer, the Prophet instructed them to repeat their prayer and ablution. Abū Ḥanīfa acts upon this report and declares that laughing in prayer invalidates the ablution. Al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī, on the other hand, criticises this report on the basis of the matn (al-Jazīrī 2001, 54). Some form of bodily discharge is the primary reason why the ablution breaks, so how can laughing in prayer invalidate the ablution?

Brown cites the example of the Muslim Khwāja Aḥmad Dīn Amritsārī, one of the originators of the Ahl al-Qurʾān movement, who began to show scepticism towards the authenticity of ḥadīth when he came across a report suggesting that Moses knocked out the eye of the angel of death (1999, 95). If the Muslims dismiss such hadīths because they defy logic, it pushes them down a slippery slope where they begin to question all areas of religion. The miraculous night journey of the Prophet (al-Isrāʾ wa-al-miʿrāj) should also then be rejected, as this seems even more unlikely and contrary to common sense. Are we in a position to correct the Prophet, who came as a teacher and guide from his Lord?

So perhaps because of the sensitivity of matn criticism, Muslim scholars have avoided the area or at least indulged in it with great care. Criticising the reporters of the ḥadīth in question does not have wider implications on one’s faith. Questioning the matn does. Westerners, who are oblivious of Muslim sensitivity on the issue, have then assumed that ḥadīth criticism was only centred on isnād criticism.
Though the Nuzhah of Ibn Ḥajar has very little to say on matn criticism – the exception is perhaps in the section on mawdū‘ where we are informed of means by which a fabricated report can be identified by the weak wording of the text – there is at least some indication in the works of other Muslim scholars that matn criticism did exist in some form. In fact, some reports in the universally-accepted works of al-Bukhārī and Muslim faced criticism because of the matn, not because of weakness in the isnād or the unreliability of the reporters. There is a ḥadīth in al-Bukhārī’s works which state that the verse of the Qur’ān ‘And if two parties of the believers fall to fighting, then make peace between them’ (49: 9) refers to the conflict between the sincere Companions and the followers of ‘Abd Allāh ibn Ubayy. Ibn Baṭṭāl points out that the verse actually refers to a quarrel between two groups of Muslims, whereas Ibn Ubayy had not accepted Islam when the verse was revealed (Siddiqi 1993, 115). Similarly, a ḥadīth in the works of Muslim – in which the Prophet instructed Abū Ḥudhayfa’s wife to allow the fully-grown man Sālim to suckle her – has been severely criticised by scholars for the contents of the matn, not because of any doubts surrounding the isnād (Kamali 2005, 208). Forged reports regarding the superiority of certain chapters of the Qur’ān were detected by the matn, not the isnād (Azami 1977, 69).

But such examples are sporadic and relatively rare. And more crucially, there is a pattern found in the reports that are criticised on the basis of the matn. In the rare instances where ḥadīth scholars have rejected a report on the basis of the matn, they have interpreted it in such a way that it still protects the dignity of the Prophet. Or to word it differently, the Muslims were carefully selective in which types of reports could be criticised on the basis of the matn and which could not. Abbott reached the conclusion that Muslim scholars dealt with reports on al-targhib wa al-tarhib with much more leniency than reports on shari’a (1967, 77). What this shows that if they had genuinely wanted to, they could have looked into matn criticism for all types of reports. Their piety prevented them from doing so.

Or was the isnād over-emphasised?

The above analysis has approached the matter suggesting that the Nuzhah did not give enough attention to the matn. This same matter can be approached differently which involves asking: why too much emphasis on the isnād? So rather than observing the limited emphasis given to the matn, we can instead ask why a substantial emphasis was given to the isnād. What did Ibn Ḥajar see in the isnād which made it such an integral part of his Nuzhah? Four theories of proposed:

Ibn Ḥajar was an expert in rijāl literature and he allowed this proficiency to manifest itself in the Nuzhah. Al-Iṣāba fi asmāʾ al-ṣahāba, Tahdhīb al-tahdhīb, al-Durar al-kāmina fi aʿyān al-miʿā al-thāmina and Lisān al-mīzān are all, well-known literary works by Ibn Ḥajar. All relate to ʿilm al-rijāl. It is quite natural for an author to over-expand a certain area in a book because he has more expertise in it. As an expert in rijāl literature, Ibn Ḥajar did exactly that. The longest section in the Nuzhah is devoted to ‘knowing the paidonymics of the reporters and other related matters’ (5.65). Other extensive sections in the Nuzhah such as mutashābih (5.61) again relate to the isnād and the men in them. So therefore Ibn Ḥajar’s academic actuality affected his Nuzhah in many ways and led to the extra emphasis on the isnād.

Ibn Ḥajar gave considerable emphasis to the isnād in the Nuzhah because he genuinely thought that new research still could be done in this area. Admittedly, this ‘new’ research took on the form of correcting the mistakes of his predecessors. For instance, in section 5.65, Ibn Ḥajar felt the need to correct al-Ḥāfiz Abū Bakr Aḥmad ibn Hārūn al-Bardījī over the issue of whether Ṣughdī was in fact a unique name or not. Nevertheless he saw gaps in the field which had not been addressed by those before him. This is proven by the fact that of the ten completely original sections found in the Nuzhah and not to be found in the influential Muqaddima of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ, eight of them relate to rijāl literature. These are: (i) knowing the reporters whose kunya is the same as the name of their father (ii) where the name of the reporter is the same as the kunya of the father (iii) knowing the reporters whose kunya is the same as the kunya of the wife (iv) knowing the reporters whose shaykh’s name corresponds with the father’s name (v) knowing the reporters whose own name, father’s name and grandfather’s name are the same (vi) knowing where the reporter’s name coincides with the name of his shaykh and his shaykh’s shaykh upwards (vii) knowing the cases where the name of the reporter’s shaykh coincides with the one he reported from (viii) knowing the reporters whose name is their kunya (ix) knowing when the name of the reporter and the name of his father is the same as the grandfather’s.
Ibn Ḥajar saw this new addition as important, shown by the fact that with form vii, he adds the words ‘This is a unique form which Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ did not come across.’ This suggests that maybe Ibn Ḥajar was not underselling the matn; rather he was addressing areas that needed modification and introduction, of which many did still relate to the isnād.

Previous ḥadīth masters continued to rate and review reporters to people living in their own time too. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī (d. 463/1071) reviewed reporters belonging to generations before him, as well as people occupied in ḥadīth during his own time. Ibn ‘Asākir (d. 571/1176) too reviewed the men of the discipline until his own era, as well as al-Dhahabī (d. 748/1348). Ibn Ḥajar continued the tradition by showing interest in transmitter evaluation, just like his predecessors had.

There is another theory, voiced by William Graham\(^{284}\), which can answer why Ibn Ḥajar gave so much attention to the isnād, but it requires us to step back for a moment from the idea that the isnād’s only function is to support the ḥadīth’s authenticity.

Graham commences with the observation that for the Islamic world, traditionalism has played a much greater role than in largely industrialized and developed countries. All great figures that are highly regarded in Islam made a similar call; a return to the early Islam, the abhorrence of bid’a and a desire to protect the early heritage. As we get to the end of time, this is the time when Muslims will find it harder to practise their religion, it is the time when fasād will set in. In all this, the isnād helps immensely to create a sense of belonging to the earlier times. Graham writes:

One particular element of this Islamic traditionalism is pervasive, even indispensable: a “sense of connectedness”, or to coin an Arabic neologism for this, ittiṣāliyyah – the need or desire for personal “connection” across the generations with the time and the personages of Islamic origins – something that has been a persistent value in Muslim thought and institutions over the centuries (Graham 1993, 501).

Graham asks us to entertain the possibility that the isnād was much more than just a chain of men reporting an incident. We must remember that hadīth was not just an authoritative maxim used to elaborate Islamic law and dogma; it was also a ‘form of connection to the Prophet’s charismatic legacy’ (Brown 2009, 15). The Qur’an and Sunna may provide the fundamental basis of Islam, but it ‘is the isnād system of documenting the authenticity of all transmission of knowledge that provides the specific model for various forms of unbroken “connection” with the first generation of the Salaf, the idealized Muslim Ummah’ (Graham 1993, 506).

This idea of ittiṣāliyyah therefore focuses on touching the previous greats and the men of learning via the means of the isnād. Clearly, the matn is of pivotal importance to the Muslims, particularly when it is ascribed directly back to their Prophet. But the men who carried that message also hold something for us too. Graham writes:
What is crucial here is the fundamental presupposition that truth does not reside in documents, however authentic, ancient, or well-preserved, but in authentic human beings and their personal connections with one another. Documents alone, without a line of persons possessed of both knowledge and righteousness to teach and convey them across the years, are useless as instruments of authoritative transmission (Graham 1993, 507).

The fact that early ḥadīth works were in the form of musnads suggests the importance of this connection because this type of collection concentrates on whom one heard from, as well as what one heard. This observation of Graham can only be worthy of mention here if we can link it to Ibn Ḥajar and prove that he believed in ittiṣāliyya, and thus that is why the isnād was the focus of so much attention in his Nuzhah. There is sufficient evidence that indicates that the isnād did have more than an academic function to him. For instance:

a. It was noted in chapter two that Ibn Ḥajar taught in a number of institutions in Mamluk Cairo. He did not teach in most of these places for an extended period of time. However, the exception was the ṣūfī lodges of Baybars in Cairo, where he taught for over twenty years. Perhaps the prolonged period here was a result of his love for the ṣūfī mystics and their way of life. This point is crucial because the ṣūfī attach great importance to the isnād, not so much in the ḥadīth authenticity sense, but more in its spiritual sense. After the first three centuries, Sufism began to develop into discreet teaching traditions, or paths (تاریقات), all of which could be linked back to a grand teacher. These paths themselves then could be ascribed back to the Prophet’s Companions, most notable ‘Alî. Therefore at the centre of the Sufism lied ‘the key concept of an initiatory isnâd of spiritual guides or masters that is most commonly referred to as a chain or silsilah’ (Graham 1993, 515). Brown writes that Sufism believed in two types of isnâds; isnâd al-tazkiya (also called isnâd al-ṣuḥba) and the isnâd as a vehicle to transmit and pass on esoteric knowledge (2009, pp. 188-9). Either way, the fact is that for the şûfîs, the isnâd was all important and from what we know about his life, Ibn Ḥajar was close to Sufism. b. Ibn Ḥajar spent approximately ten years studying ḥadîth with al-‘Irâqî (d. 806/1404) (Ahmadayn 1958, 9; al-Barrî et al. 1995, 96). His teacher was known to conduct occasional amâlî sessions (Brown 2009, 46). The reason why this took place is answered by Brown when he writes:

It is evident from these developments that by the eleventh century the transmission of ḥadîths and books via a living isnâd possessed little practical value. Why then did it continue? Simply put, the foundational principle of the Islamic tradition, that authority comes through a connection to God and His Prophet, still dominated Muslim scholarly culture. The isnâd was that chain that connected a scholar to the Prophet and allowed him to act as an authoritative interpreter of Islam. Hearing a ḥadîth or a book of ḥadîths by an isnâd, even if by ijâza, breathed a soul into otherwise lifeless pages and rendered the book legally compelling (2009, 45).
Academically speaking, there was little point in such sessions conducted by al-‘Irāqī. It was done more for the sake of the spiritual benefit, or to use Graham’s terms, to give a sense of ittiṣāliyya to the earlier times. Perhaps such sessions made Ibn Ḥajar realise that the isnād held a special place in his religion.

c. Ibn Ḥajar dedicated a whole section in the Nuzhah appealing to students to adopt the correct outlook and etiquettes when engaged in ḥadīth studies section (5.66). The section was in essence an appeal to understand that studying ḥadīth was more than just the science of it. Rather, it involved immersing oneself in the religious and spiritual benefit to be derived from it, and becoming part of a long chain of pious men dedicated to preserving Islam’s heritage.

Graham’s theory is important because it bridges the cultural gap that is otherwise sometimes missing in the works of non-Muslim academics (this will be referred to later on in this section). For our analysis here on the Nuzhah, it supports the idea that perhaps Ibn Ḥajar did not give too little emphasis on the matn, but too much emphasis on the isnād. Graham’s essay answers why someone like Ibn Ḥajar would choose to adopt such a stance. Because he was further away from the Prophet’s time than, for example, Ibn al-Salāḥ, it allows us to appreciate why the Nuzhah concentrated on matters related to rijāl literature more than the Muqaddima. It also allows us to appreciate why dār al-ḥadīths had limited success during that period than compared to schools related to fiqh. In short, ḥadīth was about the shaykhs, his personality and his baraka and not the places he taught. Additionally, Graham’s observations allow us to answer why Ibn Ḥajar dedicated so much of his literary efforts on rijāl-related literature such as Tahdhib al-tahdhib and al-
Durar. For Graham, such literature is important to highlight how much emphasis Muslims gave to not just to knowledge, but the carriers of it too. It was not just a matter of creating a who's who account for the sake of it. Rather, the idea behind such works was to show that ‘the history of the Islamic community is essentially the contribution of individual men and women to the building up and transmission of its specific culture’ (Gibb in Graham 1993, 509). Finally, it shows that the isnād meant authority in the ninth Islamic century just as much as it did in the fourth Islamic century. Even today, the isnād gives Muslims a sense of attachment. The twentieth century scholar Ahmad al-Ghumarī (d. 1960) recited ḥadīths with full chain of transmissions back to the Prophet in dictation sessions in Cairo’s al-Ḥusayn mosque (Brown 2009, 46). Such a practice would only make sense if the isnād is a timeless mechanism that allows Muslims of all times to connect to the ‘best of generations’.

6.2. The technical terms.

The technical terms served many functions in 'ilm al-ḥadīth. First and foremost, they existed to differentiate one type of ḥadīth from the other, with the aim of creating ease for the reader. In the early period of ḥadīth studies, there was less harmonisation between the terms and so this need was felt more. Sometimes, the lack of clarity could matter dearly. Like it has been shown in 5.43., there was no clear dividing line between maqtū‘ and munqatî‘ early on, two terms which are quite different since one pertains to the isnād and the other to the matn. Sometimes, these variations were small and trivial. For instance, some treatises used the work saqīm in the place of da‘if, like al-Mayyānishī’s (d. 580/1184) work, Mā lā yasa‘u al-muḥaddith jahlūhū (Librande 1982, 39). This also suggests that the terms did not always follow common-sense; literally speaking, saqīm is more correct than daʿīf because the opposite of ṣahīh is saqīm, and the opposite of qawī is daʿīf.

With this function in mind, the Nuzhah was not so pivotal. Most observers would agree that the Nuzhah was not instrumental in laying down the technical terms used in ʿilm al-ḥadīth. That honour fell to the Muqaddima, which led to ‘agreement on the meaning of each term by ḥadīth specialists’ (Librande 1982, 34). Even Ibn Ḥajar had accepted that Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ had cemented the foundation and basis for the technical terms. This is evident because:

a. He did not question his technical terms largely, except in a handful of places. Even then, the difference could hardly be described as devastating. For instance, Ibn Ḥajar indirectly criticised Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ for suggesting that shāḥīd and munkar were synonymous (section 5.12).

b. Ibn Ḥajar did not introduce any new term that had not mentioned in the Muqaddima. The lone exception is muḥkam (5.14.).

However, I think the thesis has indicated other purposes the technical terms served, many which relate to the ninth Islamic century. The analysis of the Nuzhah has shown the following in relation to the terms:

1. The vast array of technical terms was used to display the exactitude of the discipline. Certainly in the Nuzhah, Ibn Ḥajar used this tactic to highlight the rigid, scientific and complex system painted by his predecessors in ʿilm al-ḥadīth. Both muhmal (5.52) and mubham (5.36) refer to when the name of the reporter is unclear and one term perhaps would have been sufficient. But giving each situation its own name and definition served to show the complexity of the field. The difference between mu’talif, mukhtalif (5.60) and mutashābih (5.61) is hardly noticeable yet each one is meticulously differentiated from the other. Even when a type lacked objectivity, like with mu’allal, it was given a scientific and objective feel to it. For someone reading ‘ilm al-ḥadīth for the first time, this theme suggested that the ḥadīth scholars were aware of all the differences and variations they came across in their research, and possessed the correct tools to analyse them.

2. The use of technical terms indicated what area was considered more important than others. In the Nuzhah, the prime example of this was explained in section 5.47. For terms relate to ‘uluww nisbī – muwāfaqa, ṣadāl, musāwāh and musāfāha, and none to ‘uluww muṭlaq. It seems that by the ninth Islamic century, the social and scholarly rank associated with an isnād was more important than the main and underlying purpose of the isnād: to prove the authenticity of a ḥadīth.

3. Following on from the above point, it seems that in some form, the technical terms became the goal per se by the time of Ibn Ḥajar. Just prior to him, his teacher al-‘Irāqī penned the Alfiyya, a poem-based work lauding the thousand terms and rulings related to the discipline. In the sixth century, al-Mayyānī’s influential work – which Ibn Ḥajar mentions in the introduction to the Nuzhah – only mentioned fourteen; ṣaḥīh, saqīm (weak), ḥasan, mashhūr, shādhdh, ḡarīb, mu’dīl, musnad, mawṣūl, mufrad, mawqūf, munqaṭi‘, mursal and maqtū‘. This indicates that an appreciation of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth was possible minus the plethora of terms. Judging by the attention given to the terms in the Nuzhah, Ibn Ḥajar preferred the use of as many terms as possible.

The stagnant nature of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth by the eighth and ninth Islamic centuries may have well been the catalyst to this. The scholars saw few fresh, innovative and original avenues to explore as far as research was concerned. In this academic drought, scholars such as al-‘Irāqī and Ibn Ḥajar turned their attention to fine-tuning established terms and praising their predecessors’ exactness.

4. One final aim of the technical terms, in my opinion, was to extend the pool of material that ḥadīth scholars could work from. The deliberate use of certain words gave the impression that the scholars had a wide source of sound, acceptable traditions to work from. This was highlighted clearly in section 5.39. Ibn Ḥajar could have used a different word for ḥasan li-ghayrih, but doing so would mean suggesting that it was different to li-dhātih, and therefore should be treated differently in terms of ruling. On the other hand, using the same term would give the impression of a close resemblance to šahīh and ḥasan. The term ḥasan li-ghayrih was deliberately used and introduced to conceal the fact that in essence, it was weak and rejected.

Undoubtedly, the technical terms coined and employed by the ḥadīth masters were wonderful and a testimony to their hard work. For most part, the terms were clear, concise and eventually harmonised by the time of Ibn Ḥajar. But my analysis here has avoided this portrayal entirely, purely because it was been voiced and promoted by Muslim scholars for centuries and needs no repeating here. What does need to be evaluated is the other implicit and covert functions behind the terms, which has been the purpose of this overview here. This is missing in the analysis of Muslim scholars – classic and contemporary ones. The four points I have elaborated above show that by the ninth Islamic century, there were more to the terms than meets the eye.

The previous section on the technical terms suggests they were used in different circumstances to serve different purposes. Just as important as this discussion is whether the technical terms had any practical importance. The Nuzhah offers a comprehensive account of the technical terms, their usage and for most part, examples for each. But was this just merely an academic exercise? Did Ibn Ḥajar felt bound to define the terms because they were part of the tradition? Or did he elaborate on the terms in the Nuzhah, knowing and expecting them to be useful to critics and readers in his own time and after?

In order to answer these questions, the following section is an analysis of the technical terms employed in Ibn Ḥajar’s Fatḥ al-bārī bi sharḥ ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī. The first eight chapters of the Fatḥ have been observed (kitāb badʾ al-wahy, kitāb al-īmān, kitāb al-ʿilm, kitāb al-wudūʾ, kitāb al-ghusl, kitāb al-hayd, kitāb al-tayammum and kitāb al-ṣalāh until kitāb sujūd al-Qurʾān) to note the frequency, reasons and purpose behind the usage of the terms that have been outlined in the Nuzhah.
From the analysis I have conducted, the ten oft-used technical terms in Fath al-bārī bi sharḥ šaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī (that can be found in the Nuzhah too) are:

1. Šaḥīḥ
2. Marfūʿ
3. Mawṣul
4. Muʿallaq
5. Daʿif
6. Ḥasan
7. Mursal
8. Mudallas
9. Muʿallal

After offering an analysis of some of these terms specifically, the section will conclude with some general observations on the use of technical terms in Fath al-bārī.

Owing to the fact that Fath al-bārī is a commentary of Šaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī – a work dedicated to gathering the sound reports – it is no surprise that the term šaḥīḥ has featured the most.
Interestingly, the term is often used to describe the isnād rather than the entire ḥadīth. So for example, Ibn Ḥajar will alert the reader of other variations of the report listed by the words bi sanad saḥīḥ. This could suggest two things. Firstly, the report in question has a saḥīḥ isnād, not necessarily a saḥīḥ matn. Secondly, and perhaps more plausibly, because the conditions of a saḥīḥ report mainly pertain to the isnād, he has used this phrase.

Mursal

Typically, Ibn Ḥajar highlights the other reports to be found (in other compilations) to support the existing one to be found in the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī. There are several places where these supporting narrations are mursal. Importantly, this suggests that though mursal is in essence rejected, Ibn Ḥajar believes they do carry weight in the sense they can be used to support existing sound reports. Explicitly, he voices this opinion in Fath al-bārī when he writes:

> The mursals are suitable for evidence according to the opposition (in this case, the Ḥanbalis) and according to us too (Shāfīʿīs), when it is supported (by other chains) (2004, 1:310).

In the chapters related to fiqh in Fath al-bārī, the term mursal is more frequent than the chapter on faith. Practically, this supports the general observation made by many researchers that prophetic traditions in the fiqh genre are frequently mursal. I have already noted this in the thesis on the section on mursal (section 5.19). For instance, the term mursal has been used in kitāb al-īmān six times. In kitāb al-wuḍū’ alone, the same term has been used thirteen times. Perhaps more significantly, there are three places in kitāb al-wuḍū’ where Ibn Ḥajar clarifies the ruling of mursal in some detail (2004, 1: 310, 351 & 387).

The term mu‘allaq too has featured often in the Fath and again for understandable reasons. This thesis has already highlighted (section 5.18) how mu‘allaq is usually rejected though the scholars have made an exception when such reports feature in a compilation dedicated to the sound, like the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī. It is well documented that the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī contains many mu‘allaq reports. In the chapter on knowledge alone, one–hundred and two reports are included, of which eighteen are mu‘allaq (2004, 1: pp.172-280).

Ibn Ḥajar therefore uses the term mu‘allaq (and ta‘līq) to alert the reader of the places where al-Imām al-Bukhārī has included such reports in his compilation. Coupled with this is the frequent use of wa-ṣa-la when Ibn Ḥajar wants to show where the full, uninterrupted report is to be found. In this regard, wa-ṣa-la may be different to the technical noun (and not verb) mawṣūl.
Marfūʿ

Marfūʿ is used often too. However, I think there is sufficient evidence to suggest that Ibn Ḥajar did not always mean the technical term per se, but rather a means of short-handing the text. For example, Ibn Ḥajar writes:

It has been proven in Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim through another chain, from ‘Ā’isha marfūʿ:

‘I did not see him – namely Jibril – in the form that he was created in except on two occasions’ (Ibn Ḥajar 2004, 1: 30).

Ideally, he should have written ‘from ‘Ā’isha, from the Prophet (peace and blessings of Allah be upon him)’…

There are only a handful of places where it seems he has used marfūʿ in its correct, technical usage. For instance, he writes:

Salīm ibn ‘Āmir said: I saw Abū Bakr, ‘Umar and ‘Uthmān consume [food] that had been touched by fire and they did not perform the minor ablution [after it].’

We have reported this from many paths, from Jabir as marfūʿ and as mawqūf…” (2004, 1: 371).

Here the term has been used correctly, namely a report that stems from the Prophet, as opposed to a report stemming from the Companions (mawqūf).

In the Nuzhah, Ibn Ḥajar chooses the term mu‘allal to refer to a ḥadīth that has a hidden, defamatory weakness in it (section 5.27). However, in his Fatḥ al-bārī he uses the term ma‘lūl instead, and for the verb he uses a‘alla.

The scholars of the discipline have for long discussed which term is more suitable; ma‘lūl or mu‘allal. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ begins his section in the Muqaddima with the title ma‘rifat al-ḥadīth al-mu‘allāl, but immediately points out that the experts of ḥadīth also call it ma‘lūl (1986, 89) and that this is more appropriate from a linguistic perspective. Al-Suyūṭī too discusses which term is more suitable from a grammatical perspective and also indicates which ḥadīth scholars use the term ma‘lūl (1972, 1: 251).

In my opinion, there are two possible reasons why Ibn Ḥajar used ma‘lūl rather than mu‘allal in Fatḥ al-bārī. Firstly, he preferred the term that had more resonance with experts and non-experts in ‘ilm al-ḥadīth, and that was ma‘lūl. Fatḥ al-bārī was aimed at a more universal audience and therefore it made sense to use terms that could be understood more easily from a grammatical perspective.

Secondly, al-Suyūṭī writes that al-Bukhārī, al-Tirmidhī, al-Ḥākim and al-Dāraquṭnī preferred ma‘lūl rather than mu‘allal (1972, 1: 251). Perhaps because Fatḥ al-bārī was a commentary of al-Bukhārī’s work, he deemed it appropriate to use the term al-Bukhārī preferred.

General observations

- Overall, the use of technical terms in Fath al-bārī is infrequent. Therefore, I do not believe that a reader who has little or no knowledge of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth will find his ignorance is a major hurdle to understanding Fath al-bārī. The reason for this opinion is two-fold:

  a. Firstly, the presentation skills employed by Ibn Ḥajar in Fath al-bārī are exemplary. After each ḥadīth, he includes the relevant information and commentary in a systematic order. Typically, he (i) why al-Imām al-Bukhārī has included the ḥadīth in the relevant section (ii) provides information on the men in the isnād, like important biographical information and their rank in ḥadīth reporting (iii) a word by word analysis of the words in the matn (iv) the derived rulings and observations from the ḥadīth as a whole. In addition to this, each kitāb ends with an overview of the type of reports (in terms of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth terminology) found in the section. For example, the chapter on ḥadīn – which also features prophetic reports on congregational prayers and imamate – concludes with the title fā ‘idah, under which Ibn Ḥajar writes:

> The chapters on congregational prayers and imamate consist of one hundred and twenty-two marfūʿ ḥadīths. Of them, ninety-six are mawṣūl and twenty-six are muʿallaq. The repeated reports (elsewhere) are ninety and the non-repeated are thirty-two. [Al-Imām] Muslim has recorded the same reports [in his Ṣaḥīḥ] except for nine of them’ (2004, 2: 252).
Owing to this good ordering, a reader can quickly and effortlessly refer to the section which he needs for his research or reading. A person who is not versed with ‘ilm al-ḥadīth simply does not have to read the section relating to the isnād or the concluding section analysing the type of reports featured in the chapter.

b. Secondly, Fath al-bārī is a work of dirāya rather than in riwāya. In other words, it concentrates much more on the message of the ḥadīth rather than the science behind it. For instance, the commentary provided in the chapter on Friday prayers (2004, 2: pp. 407-491) concentrates more on the ruling, principle and method of this prayer, rather than the ranking and strength of each prophetic report.

- There are rare places where Ibn Ḥajar does not just mention technical terms but explains the detail of some of the rulings related to ‘ilm al-ḥadīth in Fath al-bārī. Overall, this has happened for two reasons.

a. In places, there is an obvious need for it. For example, there are several sub-sections in kitāb al-‘ilm where discussions on ‘ilm al-ḥadīth are totally unavoidable in the commentary, precisely because the section pertains to ‘ilm al-ḥadīth rulings specifically.

Al-Imām al-Bukhārī has included sub-sections in kitāb al-‘ilm such as ‘the saying of the ḥadīth master haddathana or akhbarana or anba’ana’ (Ibn Ḥajar 2004, 1:175), ‘al-qirā’a and al-arḍ upon the ḥadīth master’ (Ibid. 1: 181) and ‘when it is legitimate to allow the minor to listen’ (Ibn Ḥajar 2004, 1: 208). Naturally, the commentary from Ibn Ḥajar in these sections was centred around discussions on ‘ilm al-ḥadīth almost entirely.
b. There are other instances where he offers an elaboration of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth rulings in order to prove or disprove a certain opinion, particularly when it relates to the ikhtilāf between the different schools of judicial thought. A prime example is on the discussion on whether the head needs to be wiped once or thrice during the minor ablution (Ibn Ḥajar 2004, 1:313). Ibn Ḥajar cites the opinion in the commentary of al-Imām al-Shāfi‘ī, who believes it is better (mustahabb) to perform the wiping thrice. As a follower of the Shāfi‘ī school, Ibn Ḥajar too gives preference to this opinion. He writes:

Abū Dāwūd has reported from two variations – Ibn Khuzayma and others have verified one of them as sound – the ḥadīth of ‘Uthmān [which supports the] wiping of the head thrice. And the addition from a thiqā is accepted (2004, 1:313).

The last sentence is a rule of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth which Ibn Ḥajar has expanded on in the Nuzhah (section 5.10.2). The only purpose of mentioning in the section of wiping is to support the practice of wiping the head thrice and thus supporting the opinion of his madhhab. So the rules of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth have been mentioned in the Fath sometimes for reasons other than explaining the inner-workings of the actual discipline.

Another example is that of mursal. Ibn Ḥajar in the Fath deems it important to outline that mursal can be used as evidence (2004, 1: 310). The reason why he explained this ruling here is owing to the rich debate between the different schools of thought on what can and cannot be used for istinjā‘. The same ruling regarding mursal is mentioned again

- Ibn Ḥajar does sometimes deviate from conventional ḳilm al-ḥadīth terms in favour of simpler ones. We have noted this already with his preference to maʿlūl rather than muʿallal. The reason for opting for simpler terms is so the appeal of Fath al-bārī extends beyond the reader of ḳilm al-ḥadīth specifically and reaches a far wider audience. In the section on marfūʿ in the Nuzhah (section 5.40), Ibn Ḥajar uses terms such as tasrīḥ and ḥukm to explain the different forms marfūʿ can take on. In a much simpler manner, he explains the same idea in Fath al-bārī (2004, 1: 358). When describing the isnād, terms such as hasan, daʿīf and saḥīḥ are standard practice. There are instances in Fath al-bārī where he used unconventional words like sāqiṭ and sāliḥ to describe the isnād. This, in my opinion, is for the purpose of ease for the average reader.

In the same manner the excellent arrangement of Fath al-bārī favours a universal audience, the language and terms employed too sometimes portrays the work as a non-elitist and accessible commentary. As a writer, this shows the skill Ibn Ḥajar possessed. He could express the same idea in different ways, depending on the intended audience.

To conclude the analysis of the technical terms in Fath al-bārī, for most part they are rare. The terms that have been used frequently are for most part famous, such as saḥīḥ. To understand ḳilm al-ḥadīth through a manual such as the Nuzhah before reading a detailed commentary like Fath al-bārī is ideal and commendable. However, in my opinion, it is not an essential prerequisite and it is not a major deterrence.

For early Muslim ḥadīth literature to be taken seriously by non-Muslim scholars, it must move from the over-protectionism shown to certain individuals and groups related to the discipline. The Nuzhah is a simple manual on ʿilm al-ḥadīth but there is still indication of prejudice and partiality in places. Just by evaluating the Nuzhah, we have shown that:

a. The works of al-Bukhārī and Muslim have been given semi-divine status in the Nuzhah. Ibn Ḥajar devotes an entire section on the esteemed works of these scholars. Only a passing mention is given to the fact that their works do contain sub-standard reports (section 5.7.1.).

b. Muʿallaq (section 5.18) is rejected. But when featured in the exemplary works of al-Bukhārī, the scholars defend his inclusion of them, rather than question whether the reports are of acceptable standard or not.

c. The likes of Mālik are described as ‘truthful’ in the Nuzhah (5.7.1.) without a full explanation why. The likes of Schacht, on the other hand, view him as a mass fabricator.

d. Ibn Ḥajar informs us that there is a slight difference between mursal khafī and mudallas. In mudallas, the narrator has met the narrator, whereas in mursal khafī the narrator is a contemporary of the missing person, but he has not met him (section 5.22.1.). The reason why this opinion is to be accepted, Ibn Ḥajar writes, is that al-Imām al-Shāfiʿī said so.

e. In section 5.36.1.2, majhūl al-ʿayn was defined and explained. This is where the narrator’s name is mentioned, but only one person narrates from him. Its principle is that it will not be accepted, until he is authenticated. But Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ does highlight the fact that al-Imām al-Bukhārī has included the reports of those from whom only one has narrated in his Șahīḥ. Only Qays ibn Abī Ḥāzim has reported from Mirdās al-Aslamī. The same can be said of al-Imām Muslim in his Șahīḥ; only Abū Salama ibn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān has reported from Rabī’a ibn Ka’b al-Aslamī (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 113). Again, we see that a report should ideally be rejected or seriously questioned at the very least, but because it features in the Șahīḥ of al-Bukhārī and Muslim, it is conveniently overlooked.

f. The Companions are above criticism in ḥadīth transmission, because Allāh and His Messenger have vouched for their honesty and integrity. As I have shown in section 5.41, their religious outlook and honesty can be seen as something entirely different to their academic ability.

g. In section 5.27 on mu’allal, we are ordered to trust the ḥadīth master’s intuition when he declares a report as defective, even if he does not explain his decision.

These seven examples from the Nuzhah show that there are certain individuals and groups that Muslims see as above criticism. Religiously, one can appreciate the difficulty for Muslims in indulging in open criticism of such esteemed figures. Who will want to impugn al-Bukhārī when he claimed he saw the Prophet in his dream instructing him to write his Șahīḥ? (Saidi 1977, 195) How can we question the sincerity of al-Bukhārī when he would perform istikhāra prayer for every ḥadīth he included in his compilation? (Pīr Karam Shah 1973, pp.163-4). If Muslims begin to seriously question the integrity of the Companions, then it means they are seeking a second opinion after Allāh’s.
In order to portray their efforts as an impartial and neutral assessment, Muslim scholars must identify whether the celebrated figures, like al-Bukhārī, Mālik and the Companions, are such because of their religious piety or because of their outstanding ability. If they believe that they are unique because of their piety, then this is not sufficient to warrant their immunity from criticism. This is because piety alone is not a safeguard against forgery and mistakes. The worse fabricators were the pious, something which even Muslim scholars, including Ibn Ḥajar, admit to (section 5.24.4.a.). In fact, Goldziher makes this one of the central pillars of his works; that the tension between the pious traditionists and the rulers was the reason for the appearance of fabrications.

Therefore, in order to add weight to their detailed contribution to the field of ʿilm al-ḥadīth, Muslim scholars need to move away from this over-protectionism and instead they need to stress that the reputation of certain individuals is due to ability and potency. They need to show that Mālik is respected in the discipline because of his ability to sift the sound from the unsound. The fact that he saw the Prophet every night in his dreams is a religious quality (Pir Karam Shah 1973, 152). Many Muslims see the two as intricately related, but for non-Muslim academics, piety means much less.

I am not suggesting that criticism is totally absent in Muslim works. The Nuzhah shows partial criticism of al-Bukhārī and warns that not all reports in his Šāhiḥ are of the highest stage of soundness (section 5.7.1.). Al-jarḥ wa-al-taʿdīl is akin to backbiting but the Muslim scholars have allowed it because it serves a greater good (5.63).
But generally, Muslims have to write sometimes with their minds and not their hearts. They have to detach themselves from their religious background and behave like impartial observers. Only then can they be taken seriously by the non-Muslim academic world.

In section 4.3, we presented two theories regarding the Nuzhah. The first suggested that like the Mugaddima of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ (d. 643/1245), the Nuzhah of Ibn Ḥajar became a milestone work that left a lasting impression on the field right up until this very day. The second theory suggested that ʿilm al-ḥadīth largely depended on the endeavours of the earlier scholars, and that the later middle ages marked slight modifications and alterations, but no serious development and originality. After an analysis of the Nuzhah in section five, we are now in a better position to assess which observation is closest to the truth.

There are indications that up until the ninth Islamic century, the field of ʿilm al-ḥadīth did develop and continue to advance to some extent. Many of the terms took on a more definitive and exact meaning. We saw in section 5.20 how munqatiʿ had a very loose application early on, but took on a very specific meaning later. The Nuzhah of Ibn Ḥajar provided much more detail, explanation and examples for types of reports that his predecessors had merely outlined. Certainly, the later works like the Nuzhah provided readers with more accessibility as a result of these changes and modifications. Overall however, it is extremely difficult to maintain a strong argument for the continued development of ʿilm al-ḥadīth up until the ninth Islamic century. Scholars like Ibn Ḥajar... displayed the late-medieval tendency to refine earlier knowledge, not to enquire into epistemological questions of importance. Goldziher observed that:

In the fifth century of Islam, the literature, especially in the religious field – al-Ghazālī is the last author with independent ideas – shows few original concepts or independent attitudes; compilation and writing of commentaries and glosses is in full swing. (1971, 245)

Specifically in the field of ḥadīth, he noted that the period of compilations like the canonical collections quickly gave way to ‘dry and lifeless compilation’ (1971, 245).

By analysing the Nuzhah, we can understand his viewpoint. What follows is just a small indication of how Ibn Ḥajar’s work reflected the stagnant nature of the discipline.

a. In section 5.9, I amply highlighted how the definition of sahīḥ has never really been questioned. From the fourth Islamic century onwards, it has been mildly refined but never questioned. Moreover, the variations of sahīḥ to be found from the few scholars who question it are viewed to be no different to the standard, accepted version.

b. After an excellent account of siyagh al-adā’ in section 5.55, the Nuzhah refers to wijāda (5.58) and i’lām (5.59). Ibn Ḥajar’s account of these three clearly indicate how the importance of this area did not develop at all, but rather declined drastically until ḥadīth reporting became more of a social pastime.
c. In section 5.62, Ibn Ḥajar reviews the various works pertaining to ʿatabaqāt al-ruwāt written by his predecessors. He refers to Ibn Ḥībān’s work as well as Ibn Saʿd’s on the Companions. In almost explicit terms, the Nuzhah indicates that scholars duplicated works on this area, and that only the arrangement and sequence of these works differed.

d. In section 5.70, Ibn Ḥajar outlines the different forms of compilation that disciples can refer to. He does not advocate the need for new, original material.

e. In fourteen sections of the Nuzhah, Ibn Ḥajar informs the reader of other more-detailed works on the particular type being discussed. For example, in the section on mudraj (5.28), he refers to his own work on the subject, a treatise called Taqrīb al-manhaj bi-tartīb al-mudraj. In five of these fourteen sections, he specifically asks readers to consider the works of al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī (d. 463/1071) on the relevant subject matter. In fact, Ibn Ḥajar’s work on mudraj is nothing but a slight improvement on al-Khaṭīb’s al-Fasāl li-al-wasl al-mudraj fī-al-naql. This implicitly suggests that Ibn Ḥajar is admitting that even by the ninth Islamic century, the best works available were written five hundred years earlier. If there had been better, more developed and improved works on mudraj, maqlūb, mursal khaṭīf, jahāla, mutashābih and riwāyat al-akābir ‘an al-asāghir, Ibn Ḥajar would have asked the reader to refer to them. Not once in the Nuzhah does he ask readers to refer to the works of his teacher al-‘Irāqī. Instead, the stagnant nature of the discipline meant the best works belonged to the likes of al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī five hundred years earlier.

f. Of the commentaries that were written on the important works like the Muqaddima of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ, all of them felt the need to explain the text, not to critically assess it. The authors of these had accepted the endeavours of their pious ancestors and geared their effort towards explaining their work in a better manner.

This pattern is more of a concern in the modern period. During the thesis I utilised the writings of recent Muslim scholars like Ḥamdān, Anwar, Mīḥālī and al-‘Uṭaymīn, all notable experts in Ḥiṣn al-ḥadīth. None showed a desire the question the methodology of the earlier works in the field. In Ḥiṣn al-ḥadīth (2003) Mīḥālī offered his own account of the discipline, which included an explanation of all of the technical terms and a brief biographical account of the early ḥadīth masters. Almost all of the definitions were taken from the Nuzhah directly, word by word.

In this sense, this is precisely what I feel differentiates my commentary on the Nuzhah from the many available ones in the Arabic and Urdu language. Whereas others have merely repeated and re-phrased works like the Nuzhah, I have asked more engaging and critical questions that tell us more about the discipline and the era these works were produced in.

Based on these observations, it is clear that the Nuzhah did indicate a decline in academic activity in ḥadīth studies at that period. The Nuzhah itself is an indication of that decline in so many ways. Once we have established the relative stagnancy of Ḥiṣn al-ḥadīth at that time, we need to ask why this happened. A few plausible explanations are offered below:

a. Ḥiṣn al-ḥadīth declined because ḥadīth declined. Bayḥaqī (d. 458/1066) declared in his time that all the prophetic reports that could be reliably attributed to the Prophet had been documented, and thus any previously unrecorded reports should be considered de facto forgeries (Brown 2009, 42). This was the case by the fifth Islamic century. By the eight, ‘not even the greatest ḥadīth scholars of their day such as Shams al-Dīn al-Dhahabī (d. 748/1348) and Jamāl al-Dīn Mizzī (d. 742/1341) would dare to claim that they were in possession of a ḥadīth reliably said by the Prophet that had gone unnoticed until their time’ (ibid.). If there was no new material to classify, study and comment on, then there was no need for a radical overview of ʿilm al-ḥadīth either. So by the ninth Islamic century, ʿilm al-ḥadīth scholars like Ibn Ḥajar had no choice but to follow and adhere to their pioneers in the field. They genuinely believed that they could not add anything new to the field.

Related to this is the way ḥadīth were gathered and compiled after the six canonical collection. The emphasis shifted away from unearthing new reports, to simply categorising existing ones for easier access. Al-Nawawī (d. 676/1277) gathered the prophetic reports on different times and forms of supplications in Adhkār. He also compiled Riyāḍ al-ṣāliḥīn, a collection of ḥadīths aimed at encouraging pious and ethical conduct. There were no new prophetic reports in this collection, but instead drew its sources mainly from the Shaykhayn. Other scholars concentrated on gathering ḥadīths in the shamāʿīl genre, like al-ʿIyāḍ’s al-Shīfā and al-Suyūṭī’s al-Khaṣāṣ al-Kubrā. In all of these works (and indeed others that have not been mentioned here), the material was not new. Rather it had been re-arranged for easier access. Novelty, not originality, was the key essence.

ʿIlm al-ḥadīth went through a similar process. After the sixth Islamic century, the scholars succumbed to presenting the same material, but in a different arrangement. Al-‘Irāqī’s Alfiyya was merely the Muqaddima of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ, but in poem form. The Nuzhah, even by Ibn Ḥajar’s own admission in his introduction, was a ‘brief overview of the Muqaddima’ (section 4.0).

In contrast, the fields of fiqh and tafsīr continued to develop during this same period. Fiqh developed because new scenarios and circumstances continuously arose which required original thinking from the fuqahā. Tafsīr too continued to show originality. In the area of tafsīr bi-al-athar, there was little room for manoeuvre, areas where the explanation of a verse could be directly linked to a saying of the Prophet on the matter. But through the avenue of tafsīr bi-al-ra’y, the Qur’ān experts could write commentaries based on the climate they resided in.

b. Like discussed in section 5.10.1, the lack of copyright laws meant that an academic climate prevailed that did not frown upon plagiarism. It was perfectly acceptable to copy the views and findings of other scholars. In the Nuzhah (section 5.10), we saw how Ibn Ḥajar explained al-Tirmidhī’s complex terminology using the precise answer that Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ, Ibn Daqīq al-‘Īd and Ibn Kathīr had given previously. When explaining a certain type of ḥadīth, the Nuzhah often gives the same example that al-‘Irāqī gave in his Alfiyya. Then al-Suyūṭī after Ibn Ḥajar simply copied large pieces of text from the Nuzhah for his Tadrīb.

If a climate existed that viewed plagiarism as a major academic crime, we may have witnessed fresh thinking during the later middle ages of Islam. But the absence of it meant apathy and laziness. Goldziher is right when he observes:

> When an Arab critic points to the tenth century as the period in which there are hardly any more authors but merely copyists he is too lenient towards the preceding five hundred years. Al-Muqaddasî (fourth century) was already able to say that some of his predecessors were but compilators (1971, 245).

c. The above two points indicate why ‘ilm al-ḥadīth struggled to develop after the golden period in the fifth and sixth Islamic century. In my opinion, the biggest factor was what I have described in detail in the previous sub-section, the seniority and over-protectionism that marked the discipline. Even if they wanted to, the later scholars like Ibn Ḥajar knew their reputation would be smeared if they chose to critically assess and re-evaluate the work of Mālik, al-Bukhārī and Muslim. Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī and Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim transcended from being a book of academic significance to being a book of ritual relevance. Brown writes:

In cities from Damascus to Timbuktu the Ṣaḥīḥayn would be read in mosques as part of celebrations culminating in the month of Ramadan. Al-Bukhārī’s Ṣaḥīḥ in particular was read as a cure for illness from Egypt to India, and the great Moroccan conqueror Mawlā Ismā’īl (d. 1727) had a copy of the Ṣaḥīḥ carried in front of his army ‘like the Ark of the Children of Israel’ (2009, 40).

With such an esteem attached to the early works, critical assessment became impossible. More damaging would be the choice to question the ‘adāla of the Companions, a well-established cornerstone of ḥadīth studies. The only alternative therefore was to ‘toe the line’. The victim in this climate was ‘ilm al-ḥadīth.
To conclude this section, the seniority attached to certain individuals and groups made it difficult for the discipline to evolve. Ibn Ḥajar at least tried to circumvent that by developing areas that would not lead to religious and social outcry. The ḥijāl literature is an example of that. Other than the three reasons cited above, there is a simpler reason why the discipline did stagnate to a large extent. Quite simply, the further away one is from the time of compilation, the more difficult it becomes to add something new. Kamali touches upon this fact when he writes:

There is clearly little scope for any new methodology or research that would add anything substantial and useful to the work that has already been done by people who were better positioned and qualified for what they attempted and achieved (Kamali 2005, 202).

Seen from this viewpoint, we must commend Ibn Ḥajar for writing a book in a dull climate that led to universal acceptance, up until this very day.

Additionally, we should remember that what we see as development and progress in the field of ʿilm al-hadīth may not have been what Ibn Ḥajar saw as development. In fact, it may have been decline for him. For example, modern scholars may ask for a reassessment regarding the ʿadāla of the Companions. As the author of al-Iṣāba and after an extensive section on the Companions in the Nuzhah, I cannot see how Ibn Ḥajar would see that as fruitful and an indication of development. This links in with the idea of traditionalism that Graham referred to. The Islamic world was one where ‘greater value is still placed upon continuity with perceived traditional norms of great antiquity’ (1993, 499). What non-Muslims see as development and re-assessment is not the same as what the Muslims see them to be. Therefore when we talk about development and stagnancy in ‘ilm al-ḥadīth, we have to analyse such words more carefully and ask what they mean to non-Muslim academics on the one hand and traditional scholars like Ibn Ḥajar on the other.

Finally, we should also remember Ibn Ḥajar’s position in Mamluk Cairo too. As a senior member of the religious elite, there was no need to display radical and therefore possibly controversial ideas in his Nuzhah. His commentary on the Sahīh of al-Bukhārī became famous before he had even completed it. He had become a leading authority on the biographies of others, including men of his own generation. He occupied some of the best posts in Cairo. This fame meant he did not have to present something radical in his Nuzhah that would lead to fame and attention; he already had this in abundance. Therefore the status quo was ideal for him.

The analysis of the Nuzhah in section five has undoubtedly shown that Muslims are no strangers to ikhtilāf in the field of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth. Independent treaties on the discipline first appeared in the fourth Islamic century. Five hundred years later, a large degree of harmonisation for the technical terms and their rulings did exist, but by no means did it reach a consensual stage. Of these differences, some were major whereas others were petty. The Muslim ḥadīth scholars only disagreed on the name for the case when the matn and isnād had been swapped with the purpose of testing; for some it is called maqlūb and for some it is muṣṭarīb (section 5.29 & 5.31). Areas such as mursal (5.19) show a much wider degree of difference, in both definition and ruling. Throughout the Nuzhah, Ibn Ḥajar mentions the majority opinion as well as outlining other views. We saw this clearly with ʻazīz (section 5.5.), ziyadāt al-thiqā (5.10), mursal khaṭī (5.22), bidʿa (5.37) and musnad (5.44). In fact, right from the onset of the book, Ibn Ḥajar defines khabar according to his understanding, and also entertains two other variations of it according to others.

The fact that Ibn Ḥajar does mention the ikhtilāf in the field is important. He shows in the Nuzhah that they deserve an audience, even if he personally does not agree with them. Throughout the Nuzhah, the author attempts to offer a consistent opinion on terms and rulings, but he does accommodate the view of others. In short, Ibn Ḥajar did believe in ikhtilāf.

But what is the result when a difference of opinion stems from a non-Muslim academic? In the same manner Ibn Ḥajar at least acknowledges the opinions of others in the Nuzhah, have Muslims in the past two centuries accommodated the views of westerners? Largely, they have not. Their views have been treated differently and in a less-appealing light. For instance, Schacht’s observations on Mālik have been totally dismissed by Muslim scholars as bordering on the insulting. If a rich tradition of ikhtilāf can and has existed between Muslims – like the Nuzhah highlights – why is this now rejected when it stems from non-Muslims? Three gaps in my opinion exist which at least begin to answer why the Muslims are less accommodating to the views of non-Muslims in the field of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth.

Muslims assert that there are certain practices, norms and values associated with their lifestyle that have not been truly appreciated by the west. They have not been able to step into the shoes of Muslims to fully grasp their viewpoint. In the discipline of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth specifically, there are certain areas that do not arouse suspicion amongst Muslims, but are seen in a very different light by western academics.

A prime example is the primacy of oral transmission, which the Nuzhah touches upon indirectly (section 5.32, 5.55 & 5.61). Many non-Muslim academics, mainly western ones, studying ḥadīth view oral transmission by narrators as insufficient and saw it as a reason to cast doubt over the authenticity of ḥadīth literature. Because common practice in the West was to give preference to written testimony over oral testimony, western academics assumed that Muslims too should follow suit. Westerners have totally ignored the fact that in the Middle East, oral transmission was actually preferred. Brown writes:

Classical scholarship portrays the process of ḥadīth transmission as primarily oral, or at least through the first century. Even after written collections of ḥadīth were compiled, oral transmission remained the ideal. Orality, in this system, was a virtue rather than a vice. Just as Islamic jurists belittled documentary evidence, preferring direct oral testimony, so the scholars of ḥadīth insisted on the superiority of direct, personal, and oral transmission of ḥadīth (1999, 88).

Western scholars dismissed the accuracy of oral transmission because they saw it as inadequate. They did not appreciate its value and rank in Arab society. For Muslims, this is the case with the vast majority of Orientalists studying Islam and thus a reason to reject their findings outright. Their own methods and approaches are described as ‘advanced’ ‘civilized’ and ‘modern’, whilst others, particularly Eastern ones, are ‘backward’ ‘primitive’ and ‘traditional’ (Tucker in Munck & O’Hearn (eds.) 1999, pp. 5-6). If the practice or approach does not originate from the west, it is automatically declared as inadequate. This is reflected in the way Juynboll rejects how the mustamlīs285 could dictate traditions to thousands of people at a time, not on the basis that there is no record of such events happening, but because his own intuition says it was impossible. Juynboll observes:

Visualising sessions such as this with many dozens of mustamlīs moving about, shouting the traditions down to the last rows of eager ḥadīth students may lift the reader into the realm of 1,001-night fantasies, but in whatever way you look at it, it is difficult to take accounts like that seriously (cited in Siddiqi 1993, 133).

Whether Juynboll is right or not here is almost irrelevant. Muslims like Siddiqi argue that it is the evidence of ‘of an impairing cultural distance’ (1993, 133) that is more worrying.

285 A mustamlī is employed in a gathering, particularly a large one. Such a person has the task to relay the shaykh’s words to those who cannot hear him directly (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 242).
The academic gap.

For Muslims, studying Islam is their prerogative, to the exclusion of all others. In particular, Muslim ḥadīth scholars based in the Middle-East (like al-Sibā‘ī) have shown utmost disbelief and dismay that English-speaking and European scholars have embarked on ḥadīth studies. Their inability to even understand Arabic is sufficient for the Muslims to reject their findings. How can Goldziher be taken seriously, when he cannot differentiate between tadwīn and kitāba, asks al-Sibā‘ī? 286 (1998, 237)

Even if the non-Muslims can overcome the academic and cultural hurdles, the religious ones still remain. Put simply, the Muslim scholars argue that the westerners’ writings on Islam cannot be taken seriously because they have never really understood Muḥammad. This is the reason why their views are inadequate. Specifically in the field of *ʿilm al-

286 Muslims assert that the Companions did write down the sunna of the Prophet during his time. As Siddīqī points out, ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Amr would write the sayings of the Prophet, and the same has been proven from ‘Āli, Samura ibn Jundab, Jābīr ibn ‘Abd Allāh, ‘Abd Allāh ibn Abī ‘Awfā and Ibn ‘Abbās (1993, 24). Prf Karam Shah too cites several examples of writing during this period (1973, pp.107-110) as does Guillaume (1924, 16).

It was the Umayyad Caliph ʿUmar ibn ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz who implemented the project of compiling and gathering these scattered works, during his reign between 99-101/717-19. In 100, he wrote a letter to Abū Bakr ibn Ḥazm, the governor of Madīna, asking him to find the traditions of the Holy Prophet, and gather them systematically (Karam Shah 1973, 140). In response, numerous scholars answered his call and began this divine project to protect the second source of Islam. They included Imām Muḥammad ibn Muslim al-Zuhārī, al-Imām al-Awzā‘ī, Ma’mar ibn Rashīd, Ḥammād ibn Salama (d. 167/783), ʿAbd Allāh ibn al-Mubārak (121/738-181/797) and Jarīr ibn ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd (d. 188/803) (al-Mahdī 1989, 122).

Al-Mahdī, along with several other scholars, classified this period as the period of tadwīn (1989, 120). Some non-Muslim scholars such as Goldziher (1971, 195) have misinterpreted this word and assumed it means the same as ‘writing’. As a consequence, they understand that al-Zuhārī was the first to write the ḥadīth of the Prophet. The word tadwīn actually means ‘to gather’. The famous linguist Ibn Manzūr offers a detailed account of the word. A dīwān (which derives from the same root word) for instance, is a compilation of papers. However, of the various ways the word can be used, he does not include ‘writing’ as one of them (1988, 4: pp.451-2). Other reports use the word to describe al-Zuhārī as the first to initiate tasnīf. Ibn Manzūr defines this as ‘differentiating one element from another’. To do the tasnīf of something is to place them in groups and orders (1988, 7: 423). Again, the word does not mean ‘writing’. In this context, it means that al-Zuhārī was the first to compile the ḥadīth systematically, not to write it. Guillaume too implicitly accepts that ʿUmar ibn ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz was the first to collect traditions, not write them (1924, 18). He writes: ‘The earliest date which Muḥammadans give for the collection of ḥadīth… (my italics) (1924, 18). Writing took place in a much earlier period, in the time of the Prophet.
Muslims state that once an observer has truly understood Muḥammad, only then can one appreciate the high and protected rank of the Companions. These are the men who followed every step of their Messenger, who loved him immensely and recorded each and every aspect of his life. They knew precisely how many white hairs he had in his beard. How can we now accuse these men of neglecting his sunna, to the extent that they had no real idea in the first century how to implement his law-based rulings? When al-Imām Mālik wanted to transmit prophetic traditions, he used to perform his ablution, sit on the edge of his bed and comb his beard. He used to dislike transmitting ḥadīth in the street, while standing or in haste (Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ 1986, 240). How can we now believe that he was a mass-fabricator? A faqīh is an honourable title given to those who spend their life studying Islamic law and applying it themselves in practice. Would it be feasible to suggest that mere story-tellers developed into fully-fledged faqīhs? (Juynboll 1996, XI: 159-170). Muslim observers are outraged by such a remark and have viewed this as a sufficient reason to dismiss Juynboll’s writings outright. On the one hand, he portrays the jurist Mālik as a forger and on the other, he suggests money-seeking street-entertainers developed into effective jurists, with ‘some sort of general expertise’ (1996, XI:191). Muslim scholars have never really accepted the findings of non-Muslims because they feel they have never fully comprehended the exalted status Muḥammad and his immediate followers hold in their religion.

These are the stumbling blocks that exist for Muslim academia that prevent a fair, impartial and realistic appreciation of the non-Muslim views in ḥadīth studies. What I have tried to show in the analyst of the Nuzhah is that if Muslims are open to ikhtilāf within their own circles, then they should be open to it from others too. In short, that these gaps mentioned above may not be as vast as depicted. The starting point for such an acceptance is to acknowledge two facts, both of which can be related to the Nuzhah.

It is naïve for Muslims to think that the westerners are not capable enough to study ḥadīth, owing to an academic gap. This is precisely why in section 5.56, I deemed it important to mention that Goldziher had explained the dispute between al-Bukhārī and Muslim over muʿanʿan reports quite brilliantly. In fact, it is a much better attempt to understand this complex argument than many Muslim experts. Muslims who reject the input of all westerns needs reminding of the translation of several classics by Western scholars from Arabic into English, which has helped Muslims living in the west immensely, such as James Robson’s Mishkāt. One of the greatest contributions has been the Concordance and Indices of Muslim Tradition. This is an easy reference guide to all the prophetic reports to be found in the six most prominent collections, together with the Sunan of al-Dārimī and the Musnad of Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal. More recently, Juynboll’s translation of Muslim’s introduction to his Ṣaḥīḥ is – quite simply – phenomenal.\(^{287}\) It is proof that western scholars can understand even the most difficult of classical Arabic texts. If there are a few cases of prejudice in the writings of western scholars, Muslim scholars should not see this as a reason to reject every comment and analysis that stems from the west.

Western academics are studying the same area.

Admittedly, there are certain areas in the discipline which arouse suspicion for the Muslim scholars. They feel that non-Muslim academics are deliberately studying their religion through the wrong spectrum, which has then affected their conclusions. For instance, Muslims argue that:

a. Muir (1858) is seen as a pioneer of ḥadīth criticism but according to Siddiqi, his main aim was to slander ‘Mahomet’, rather than criticise ḥadīth specifically. It was in essence, he says, a biographical account of the Prophet, which was ‘rather hostile’ and a ‘now outclassed biography of the Prophet’ (1993, 124).

b. Schacht made it abundantly clear that he intended to ‘concentrate as much as possible on the legal sphere’ (1959, v), though his work looks at isnāds (which is related to the sphere of ḥadīth) in detail.

c. Daniel Brown acknowledged the importance of defining the ‘position of sunna’ but his methodological approach seems to defy this objective. In his studies, he deliberately chose sources that were ‘mostly connected with a handful of controversies over sunna’ (1999, 5).

d. Schacht himself accepts that maghāzī and sīra lacks proper isnāds (1959, 139), as does Goldziher (1971, 192), but this is the source which many western scholars, particularly Juynboll, have based their works on. Muslims argue that the study of isnāds is best appreciated in ‘ilm al-ḥadīth manuals such as the Nuzhah, not in sīra and fiqh papers.
Whilst acknowledging these instances, my analysis has also reminded Muslims that the non-Muslim academics have looked at the same issues which the likes of Ibn Ḥajar have analysed in his Nuzhah. For example, Ibn Ḥajar writes that ‘the mubtadi’s report is accepted if he does not propagate his bid’ā’ (section 5.37). I have shown that this is exactly the same area that Leites analysed via the Shooting Stars traditions (5.37.2) and made some very commendable observations. There is overlap between the non-terminological type of mashhūr and the idea of the ‘living tradition’ (5.4). If western academics have called into question the meaning and usage of sunna in early Islam, Ibn Ḥajar did exactly the same thing (5.40). Burton showed a deep understanding of nāsikh and mansūkh (5.16), an area which Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ writes is so difficult that it ‘wears out legal scholars (1986, pp.276-7).

This is the reason why in many places during the commentary of the Nuzhah, I have presented the views of the non-Muslim academics. The purpose has not been to compare and contrast the views with the intention of concluding which view is correct. The purpose has not been to analyse the authenticity debate per se. My aim has been to show that Muslims should appreciate the ability of the western scholars and understand that they are interested in exactly the same area. In short, that their input is of value too.

Then why the distrust?

If the non-Muslim academics are skilled and are studying the same area, then why the distrust? Earlier, I mentioned the cultural, academic and religious gap that acts as hurdles which all play a part. The biggest gap however, in my opinion, is the gap in terms of perception. The way that Muslims define Orientalists and Orientalism, coupled with the history of Islam and the west means that they find it very difficult to accept the views of westerners.

Take, for example, the definition of Orientalism, as defined by Edward Said. He writes that:

Taking the late eighteenth century as a roughly defined starting point Orientalism can be discussed and analysed as the corporate institution for dealing with the Orient: dealing with it, making statements about it, authorising views of it, describing it, by teaching it, settling it, ruling over it: in short, Orientalism as a Western style for dominating, restructuring and having authority over the Orient (1995, 3).

The definition is biased and makes a negative sweeping judgement about all western studies.

Shāhīn (1998, pp.75-7) shows his distaste for non-Muslim studies on Islam when he clarifies the main aims and objectives of Orientalists.

a. To give a wrong impression of everything related to Islam, its goals and intentions.

b. To give a false impression of Muslims in general, and of the scholars and renowned figures in particular.

c. To portray the Islamic community throughout history – in particular the first generation of Muslims – as a disassembled community who often killed one another.
d. To portray the Islamic civilization negatively, to belittle its status, to insult its heritage and ignore its contribution to human development.

e. To propagate ignorance of the nature of Muslim society, and to perceive it according to what the Orientalists know of their own culture and norms.

f. To intentionally distort the Islamic texts, by creating a feel of uncertainty and doubt.

g. To have their own way in choosing the sources they wish to use. For example, they use sources of Arabic Literature (adab) as a basis to judge the sunna of the Prophet, or they use historical sources to judge matters of judicial law.

Some of this ill-feeling is justified. For example:

i. In the commentary, I highlighted in section 5.33 that Goldziher distorted the text regarding al-Zuhri and his relationship with the state.

ii. The coverage of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth by western academics is uneven and disproportionate sometimes. Both Schacht and Juynboll criticise the family isnāds to considerable depths, but they are rare, as even Burton admits.

iii. Burton notes that the language employed by Goldziher in Muslim Studies bordered on the insulting. He writes:

Serious issue…must be taken with his generous use of emotive, not to put too fine a point upon it, pejorative language. Consider the frequency with which he interlards his most penetrating analyses with vocabulary of deception and conspiracy, using, for instance, such terms as ‘fraud’, ‘fabrication’, ‘invention’, ‘falsification’ – even ‘lies’ (1994, xii).
Similar remarks have been made about the tone Juynboll adheres to in his works (Siddiqi 1993, 134). For Muslims, this is an indication that the aim of the Orientalists’ interest in Islam is to degrade the religion, not to study it.

iv. Goldziher’s key findings were that the ḥadīth does not tell us anything about Muḥammad, but the political, social and theological context that it appeared in during the first and second Islamic century. Muir deemed traditions to be untrustworthy if the text furthered a common bias to all Muslims and if the narrator appears to have a special interest or prejudice (Muir 1858, liii). But Muslims say that surely this same argument can be turned on its head and used to criticise the context Muir and Goldziher found themselves in. Both were writing in the nineteenth century, a time of colonialism, enlightenment and the academic ascendancy of the west, coupled with a general decline in the east. If a ḥadīth narrator cannot detach himself from a special interest he holds, theological or political, it also means we can dismiss the works of Muir because he worked as a Christian missionary in India, and the works of Goldziher, because he was the secretary at the Hebrew Congregation in the Hungarian city of Pecs.

On the other hand, a large proportion of this ill-feeling is not justified and this is what I tried to show in the commentary of the Nuzhah. Merely because the view stems from ‘them’ and not ‘us’, it is refuted, rejected, rebuked and dismissed by Muslims. And this is where we return to the very first comment in this particular section; that Muslims do and can accept dispute, and are no strangers to ikhtilāf. The Muslims’ own research shows doubt, uncertainty and difference of opinion. If they can accept it from within, they must learn to accept it from others too.

With reference to the Nuzhah, take the example of al-Tirmidhî’s innovative terminology (5.10). Ibn Ḥajar suggests some degree of weakness in his reports and this is the same conclusion that Goldziher reached. The Nuzhah indicates how some Muslims travelled for the sake of fame and fortune and again, this is not radically different to the conclusions Goldziher made (5.69). Ibn Ḥajar warns of the problems associated with riwâya bi-al-ma’nâ and so have non-Muslim academics (5.33).

Precisely because treatises like the Nuzhah indicate a variety of opinions on any given issue, there is room for more of a convergence between Muslims and non-Muslims. It does not have to be viewed as ‘them’ versus ‘us’. This is not an argument that they both agree entirely; rather once the perceptions and presumptions are put to one side, there is room for better dialogue. At the moment, the polemics is a result of perception more than it is facts. I deemed it important to note that on the issue of asâhîh al-asânîd (5.9), the debate between Muslims and non-Muslims were based more on empirical facts than it was perception. There is no reason why other areas too can be treated similarly. Brown too makes a similar call to base findings on facts rather than perception when he calls for a more ‘accurate approach’ of ḥadîth studies that accepts:

…the ḥadîth tradition is so vast and our attempts to evaluate its authenticity so inevitable limited to small samples, that any attitudes towards its authenticity are necessarily based more on our critical worldview than on empirical fact (2009,
Unfortunately, it seems that often, one empirical data is producing two very different conclusions. In the Nuzhah (5.24.4.e.), the author mentions how some Muslims forged reports ‘in pursuit of pleasing some leaders’, citing the example of Ghiyāth. Azami is adamant that this was a one-off occurrence, proved by the fact that almost all ‘ilm al-ḥadīth scholars have used the same example. Goldziher too cites the story of Ghiyāth. But he reaches the conclusion that this story was typical of the era and pointed to an endemic problem (1971, 74). Brown sums up the contrasting conclusions from one event when he writes:

Sunni ḥadīth critics reviled Ghiyāth b. Ibrāhīm as a forger and referred to the incident as an example of how one person forged a ḥadīth and how the network of critics immediately caught it. Goldziher, on the other hand, uses a story to illustrate an exception to represent the rule (2009, 209).

To conclude, how does all this relate to this thesis on the Nuzhah? There are areas where Ibn Ḥajar does explain an issue which can help us to understand it better, in light of the writings of westerners. I showed this in section 5.51 with sābiq and lāḥiq, in light of what Juynboll observed with regard to the muʿammarūn. But as I have already stressed, the Nuzhah helps because it shows that ikhtilāf is customary in this discipline. It is irrelevant whether its stems from Cairo or Berlin, because knowledge is the prerogative of all, not just Muslims. And Muslims need no better way to believe this than the saying of their Messenger:
Hikma is the lost-property of the believer. So wherever he finds it, he is most worthy of it.\textsuperscript{288}

The key word in this hadith is \textit{wherever}. When knowledge stems from a non-Muslim, then at the very least, it deserves to be entertained and appreciated. If it is appreciated, then this will result in benefits in another area which we have brought up during the analysis of the \textit{Nuzhah}, the stagnation of the discipline by the ninth century. A convergence of thought between Muslims and non-Muslims will perhaps spark a real, new development in the field for Muslim scholars which, otherwise, has been largely missing since the time of Ibn Ḥajar.

Though the \textit{Nuzhah} is only one book of the hundreds written by Ibn Ḥajar, the commentary has allowed us to some extent to reflect on the teachings methods of the ninth Islamic century, as well as indicate the nature of authorship at that particular period. So in this section, we will highlight the pedagogical nature of the \textit{Nuzhah}.

\textbf{6.6.1. How did the Nuzhah come about?}

Importantly, we need to first establish whether Ibn Ḥajar actually wrote the book. What this means is to enquire whether the \textit{Nuzhah} was the result of his lectures and the subsequent notes from his students, or whether he actually dedicated time to pen the book personally. There is no explicit indication from Ibn Ḥajar himself or later scholars commenting on the \textit{Nuzhah} that provides an answer to this question, and therefore our own investigation is required.

There are clues to suggest that the \textit{Nuzhah} was the direct result of him teaching ḥadīth in the various institutions, rather than direct authorship. For instance:

a. In section 5.3.1, we first entertained this possibility, upon the observation that the section on \textit{mutawātir} was muddled, repetitive and excessively detailed. In short, the wording in the \textit{Nuzhah} suggested that it had been dictated rather than hand-written personally.

b. He is not uniform in detail. For instance, at the beginning of the \textit{Nuzhah}, he meticulously defines \textit{ṭarīq}, \textit{īsnād} and \textit{matn}, including the grammatical background to the word. The same attention is not given later during the book. In section 5.65, he gives five to six examples in detail where the name of the reporter’s shaykh coincides with the disciples. In the same section, the other variations are not given the same attention.

c. There is precedence for such methodology in the work of Ibn Ṣalāḥ, \textit{‘Ulūm al-ḥadīth}. In the introduction to the \textit{Nuzhah}, Ibn Ḥajar notes that Ibn Ṣalāḥ’s book came about:

When he took over teaching at al-Madrasa al-Ashrafīyya. He refined the fields of ḥadīth (in this piece) and dictated it bit by bit. For this reason, its order was not achieved in a suitable manner.
In other words, Ibn Ṣalāḥ did not intend to write ‘Ulūm al-ḥadīth per se; rather it was gelled together from his lectures. Ibn Ḥajar’s own Fath al-bārī came about from public teaching sessions.²⁸⁹ It is quite possible that the Nuzhah was formed in a similar manner.

d. It would have been easier and more time-saving to produce the books from lecturing. In chapter two, it was shown how Ibn Ḥajar wrote over one hundred and fifty books and treatises (al-Munāwī 1999, 1: 123), including the lengthy Fath al-bārī. He also spent much of his adult life teaching in various institutions and fulfilling judicial duties. Rather than lecturing and writing on ḥadīth, he merged the two duties with the help of some students.

My own opinion is that Ibn Ḥajar did actually intend to write the Nuzhah as a book per se, based on the following observations:

a. Certainly the section on mutawātir is muddled and repetitive, but the same cannot be said for the remaining book. The rest of the book does follow a set pattern, with little deviation from the subject matter.

b. Ibn Ḥajar clarifies in the introduction of the Nuzhah (section 4.0) that his friends approached him, requesting a brief overview of the discipline. This first resulted in the Nukhbah, which only consists of a few pages. The significantly short-length of the Nukhbah, I believe, made it impossible for it to have resulted from lectures.

c. The lack of uniformity in the Nuzhah is largely justified. The decision to define ṭarīq, isnād and matn meticulously at the beginning made sense because these were terms that would be repeated often throughout the rest of the Nuzhah. Therefore it made sense to clarify their meaning and usage early on, to create ease for the reader for the rest of the book. Certain sections are longer than others. But for the most part, this was due to the importance of the subject area, not because of inconsistency. The sections on ṣaḥīḥ, bid’a, riwāya bi-al-ma’nā and mawdū‘ are longer but they are also more important.

d. Certainly, Ibn Ḥajar was a busy man and must have found it difficult to find quality time to pen the Nuzhah individually. But he was also known to work fast. For example, he finished al-Mu‘jam al-ṣaghīr of Ṭabarānī in one sitting between Zuhr and ‘Aṣr (al-Qari 1994, 52).

e. The precedence of Ibn Ṣalāh’s ‘Uṣūm al-ḥadīth as a book written from lecture notes is questionable, despite Ibn Ḥajar’s insistence on it. According to Ibn Ḥajar, because Ibn Ṣalāh ‘dictated it bit by bit’ he feels ‘its order was not achieved in a suitable manner’. But I believe that the order and sequence of ‘Uṣūm al-ḥadīth has few shortcomings and rarely does the work suggest it came about due to lecture notes. Dr. Eerik Dickinson reached the same conclusion. He translated the entire ‘Uṣūm al-ḥadīth into English and wrote articles on Ibn Ṣalāh. He believes that ‘it is unclear to me what evidence Ibn Ḥajar had at his disposal indicating that Ibn Ṣalāh wrote the book in the Ashrafīyya’ (2002, 484 (footnote 19). On this basis, Ibn Ḥajar may have been mistaken. Only the timing may have coincided between ‘Uṣūm al-ḥadīth and teaching at al-Madrasa al-Ashrafīyya.

This debate may be seen as trivial, but it perhaps gives an insight into early Muslim academia and methodology. It indicates that the scholars of that period felt the need to provide education not only to their contemporaries through lectures, but for future generations too in the forms of books and treatises. Religiously, we can say that Ibn Ḥajar wanted to leave ṣadaqa jāriya for later generations, an act during his lifetime that would bring him benefit, reward and indeed fame after his lifetime. Politically, Ibn Ḥajar’s climate meant that he could not depend on teaching and high-profile posts to enhance his reputation alone. He did occupy respected posts in Cairo, but the competition between fellow religious scholars and the changing hands in power at state level meant a lack of continuity and real success (Broadbridge 1999, pp. 87-8). Writing books gave him a sense of independency, where the success would lie in his own hands, not in the hands of the ruling elite.

During the Mamluk period, ḥadīth studies was still important. There were many notable seats of learning during this period in Cairo, such as al-Madrasa al-Shaykhūniyya, al-Madrasa al-Jamāliyya, al-Madrasa al-Ṣalāhiyya and al-Madrasa al-Kāmilīyya. Ibn Hajar taught ḥadīth to large crowds in all of these places. The list of renowned scholars that were produced under the guardianship of Ibn Hajar – the likes of al-Sakhāwī (d. 902) for example – suggests his success as a teacher.290

However, like it was shown in section 5.67 and 5.45, there was also an interest in ḥadīth studies for social reasons. Hearing ḥadīth from esteemed scholars was the path to upward social mobility in an otherwise rigid class system.

Of the two, it seems the Nuzhah was aimed at the madrasa crowd, rather than the general public who saw only the social benefits of the discipline. This is mainly, I believe, because of the depth of the book. Admittedly, it is a foundational book in the discipline

but in many places, the text seems to appeal to an audience who will go on to develop a long-term and real interest in ḥadīth. This is why:

- In approximately a fifth of the topic areas he covers in the Nuzhah, Ibn Hajar asks readers to refer to additional books and treatises on that particular type. Implicitly, the Nuzhah is suggesting that the book is the first step on the road, not the end destination.

- Two sections refer to balāgha terms like jīns and fāṣl, section 5.9., on the definition of ṣaḥīḥ and in section 5.41., on the definition of Ṣaḥābī. Understanding this requires added proficiency in other fields of knowledge too. Similarly the section on khabar (5.2) covers matters pertaining to Arabic grammar, which again suggests the Nuzhah targeted a higher calibre of an audience.

- Some sections required a good, retentive memory. This is particularly the case for the concluding sections that mention different aspects of the narrators. The section ‘Knowing the paidonymics of the reporters and other related matters’ (5.65) contains dozens of narrator names that require learning.

- Perhaps the biggest indication that he did not aim the Nuzhah at laymen is that he indirectly criticizes them in his book. When highlighting the difference between al-ʾilm al-nazārī and al-ʾilm al-qatī, he writes that laypersons do not ‘have the ability of contemplation (naẓār)’. Elsewhere in al-Durar, Ibn Ḥajar’s writings as a biographer did show some dismay towards commoners. Muḥammad ibn ‘Alī, a low class commoner, did not impress Ibn Ḥajar at all. In al-Durar, he shows his feelings towards him when he describes his death in 823. ‘And in this year, God freed us from him’, he wrote (Perho 2011, 32).
In the ninth Islamic century, Muslims were interested in ḥadīth studies for different reasons. The Nuzhah’s sequence and excellent layout suggests it was aimed at the genuine students of ḥadīth, not the ones who saw the financial and social benefit in the practice. Had it been aimed at the commoners, it may have been much shorter in length and certainly less detailed. In section 5.66, Ibn Hajar mentions the etiquettes the shaykh and disciple should adopt when studying ḥadīth. Again the section appeals to the genuine seekers, not the ones seeking fame and fortune through ḥadīth. In his work Talbīs Iblīs, Ibn al-Jawzī (d. 597/1201) was critical of the ḥadīth students ‘who spent as much as fifty years on writing, memorizing and collecting ḥadīths without understanding their contents (Makdisi 1981, 212). The Nuzhah aimed to eradicate this lack of understanding, not perpetuate it.

To conclude this sub-section, there is sufficient indication in the Nuzhah to highlight the good authorship undertaken during the ninth Islamic century. It was written for a public audience, not a private one. In the past, ḥadīth scholars were required to write for dignitaries and kings. For example, al-Ḥākim’s al-Iklīl on ḥadīth was written for an amīr. The Nuzhah was not written with such an audience in mind. In terms of length, the Nuzhah shows wisdom and care. It is not long and over-detailed like the Muqaddima of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ, nor is it too short like al-Mayyānishī’s Mā lā yasa‘u al-muḥaddith jahlūhā. Rather it strikes a good balance between accessibility and required detail. The book indicates that ḥadīth studies in the ninth Islamic century was arranged well and structured logically. In the Nuzhah, all the rejected traditions are mentioned together, the accepted together and all the matters related to the isnād are mentioned together too. Where there is an apparent lack of sequence, it is justified. I indicated in section 5.39 how the discussion on hasan li-ghayrih was delayed by Ibn Ḥajar for a legitimate and very good reason.

The fact that the Nuzhah is still used today in Islamic seminaries throughout the world as an introduction to ‘ilm al-hadīth tells us two things. My feeling is that this is a testimony to the Nuzhah’s clarity, good arrangement and its balanced length. Alternatively, it could be an indication of apathy from Muslims after Ibn Ḥajar to re-think and re-structure ‘ilm al-hadīth.

6.7. The climate of Ibn Ḥajar’s time and its influence on the Nuzhah.

The aim of this thesis is to analyse the Nuzhah, not Ibn Ḥajar himself. If the intention was to analyse him personally, then certainly a biographical account would have been the better option, a thesis that enquired into his life, works and personality in detail. Rather my aim has been to focus on one particular work of his, and ask what this indicates of the ninth Islamic century. Was the Nuzhah reflective of the type of material being produced during that period? Who was the target audience of this important work? Was it his own people or did he intend the work to be a universal treatise on ‘ilm al-hadīth for all people living in all times? So in this sub-section, an overview will be presented of the climate of Ibn Ḥajar’s era and how this may have affected his Nuzhah.
Before we proceed, there is a degree of precaution that needs to be considered.

Methodologically, there are two problems that we must keep in mind as we commence this section:

a. Ibn Ḥajar lived to a ripe age of seventy-nine. He was known to be swift in teaching and writing. Shāh ‘Abd al-‘Azīz wrote that he was known to have completed the teaching of Sunan Ibn Māja in just four sittings (al-Wajīdī 1996, 14). When we combine these two facts, then it means that the Nuzhah as a literary project made up only a very small part of his life in particular, and his era in general. Therefore we must show precaution in making sweeping generalisations about him and his era, based on the Nuzhah alone.

b. Ibn Ḥajar wrote over one hundred and fifty books during his lifetime. Larger projects such as Fath al-bārī took up a large amount of his time. Other works of his were much shorter in length. Therefore it is difficult to make statement x about Ibn Ḥajar and his time on the basis of statement y in the Nuzhah. The Nuzhah was only one of many books he penned.

Despite these two constraints, an attempt will be made to highlight how the Nuzhah gave us an insight into the Mamluk period during the ninth Islamic century. At the same time, I will be cautious, owing to the two points mentioned above. Also, I will not in this particular section indulge in what the Nuzhah told us about the academic climate of the ninth Islamic century. The reason is because this has been covered in section 6.4 (The Nuzhah: between stagnation and development).
In my opinion, the Nuzhah indicated the following about the ninth Islamic century:

2. The Nuzhah indicates that the isnād was used as a social tool during that period.

In section 6.1 of this chapter, it was mentioned how the Nuzhah – like so many other ʿilm al-hadīth works – did not give the matn its due attention. The section also entertained the possibility that rather than underselling the matn, the Nuzhah oversold the isnād.

Different reasons were given for the possible over-emphasis of the isnād, including the idea of ittiṣāliyya. This idea looked at the isnād as a religious and spiritual tool. Here, we view the isnād as a social tool.

The first point to note is that during the Mamluk period in Cairo, upward social mobility was very difficult (Perho 2011, 19). Using Ibn Ḥajar’s own al-Durar to assess the climate, Perho suggested that ‘a commoner (ʿāmma) only rarely reached the status of a notable’ (2011, 19). Elsewhere he describes the commoner’s ascent as ‘difficult and infrequent’ (2011, 21). However, there was an exception to this general rule. If there was any class of people who could shatter the glass ceiling, it was the transmitters of traditions, the muhaddiths, whose ‘fame rested in their ability to memorize ḥadīths and pass them onto others’ (Perho 2011, 21). In his conclusion, he observes that ‘most of the commoners who gained prestige in scholarly circles were muhaddiths (2011, 34).

It was not only the social status at stake. Ḥadīth was also lucrative for the fortunate few. Transmitters who possessed a rare ḥadīth or a shorter, elevated isnād could charge substantial fees to transmit in esteemed seats of learning. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ asserted that a ṣaḥīḥ master possessing elevated isnāds that wished to teach at al-Ashrafiyya would be given two dirhams every day, and upon completion, would receive thirty dinars, each worth seven dirhams (Dickinson 2002, 490).

For the majority of the Muslims in that era, it was the elevated chain (ʿulūwāw) that became the social pastime. Certainly the pursuit of elevated chains was not something unique to the Mamluk period, but in fact it had been a problem for many centuries. It was a precious commodity even in the third Islamic century (Dickinson 2002, 491). Al-Rāmahurmuzī (d. 360/970) wrote about it in detail in his ḥadīth manual al-Muḥaddith al-fāṣil. The fact that it had now become a means of social upward mobility during Ibn Ḥajar’s time suggests it had become more endemic than ever before. The masses were interested in ḥadīth for a very superficial reason and had neglected its religious value. The purpose was no longer to serve the primary function of the isnād, which is the matn.

Owing to this climate – where seeking elevation became a social pastime and where ḥadīth studies became undermined – Ibn Ḥajar’s Nuzhah was a plea for the Muslims to take the discipline seriously once again. There are many sections which implicitly at least, tell us that the Nuzhah tried to mute those who viewed ḥadīth in a social pastime. For example:

i. One of the enduring practices of Muslims throughout the middle and later medieval period was to bring their children to ḥadīth circles and then to ensure their attendance was duly recorded. The problems associated with this practice have been amply highlighted in section 5.67. The reason behind it was so that the child could enjoy the highest degree of elevation (Dickinson 2002, 498). Taking the children to such circles meant there were fewer intermediaries in the isnād. Hardly no consideration was given as to whether the child could understand what he was participating in and whether, in fact, he knew what was being recited. Dickinson cites Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ in giving one appalling case where ‘a student tells of attending a class without even knowing which of those present was granting the audition (2002, 498).

Owing to the depth in which Ibn Ḥajar covered this in the Nuzhah, the attendance of absent-minded children was still a persistent problem during his period too. Interestingly he does not prohibit it outright, most probably because it had become such a common feature during his time that outlawing it would lead to controversy and outcry. Discreetly, he reminds the reader that reports that a child takes in his youth still requires the shaykh’s permission when he eventually passes it on. In a similar fashion, he steers clear from providing a definitive age after which a child can attend ḥadīth gatherings, though he does ask Muslims to enable youngsters to reach an age of tamyīz, or differentiation. Were it not for the prevailing practice of taking young children to ḥadīth gatherings for the purpose of elevation, it is seriously questionable whether this discussion would have been even mentioned in the Nuzhah. In the early period of collection and compilation, children attending such ḥadīth circles was unheard of and certainly unproductive. The great-grandfather of Abū al-Qāsim al-Baghawī (d. 241/829) started to take the latter to ḥadīth classes when he was ten and a half, which for that period was seen as the youngest age (Dickinson 2002, 498). Early ḥadīth masters ensured that their attendees had mastered disciplines like ‘Islamic Law, religious practices and grammar’ before sitting in ḥadīth gatherings (Azami 1977, 23). It is only because of it developing into a social practice did it now warrant a mention in the Nuzhah. Therefore, the discussion in the Nuzhah on the age of reporting was a product of its time.

ii. Ibn Ḥajar’s section on siyagh al-adāʾ (5.55), wijāda (5.57) and iʿlām informs us how the practice of hearing a report and passing it on to others started as a very rigid system, only for it to develop into a farce. In the early days, hearing a ḥadīth from an established shaykh and reciting it to him for verification purposes was the lauded practice. Anything else was frowned upon. The Caliph ʿUmar was reported to have said:

> Whenever one of you finds a book containing knowledge that you did not hear from a scholar, place it in a container of water and soak it in there until the black ink [of the pen] becomes mixed with the white [of the paper] (Dickinson 2002, 488).

By the seventh Islamic century, ijazā from a teacher took on a very vague form (Dickinson 2002, 488) and by Ibn Ḥajar’s time, a ridiculous one. This is shown by the fact that in the Nuzhah, he discusses the ruling for when someone says ‘I give permission to whom shall soon be born’ ‘I permit ʿAbd Allāh to report from me’, (when there is no clarification which ʿAbd Allāh is being referred to) and ‘I give permission to all my contemporaries to report from me’. Ibn Ḥajar would have only felt the need to discuss these forms of ijazā if they existed in the first place. And there are sufficient examples to show that these absurd for permission did prevail in his time. Again, this shows how the contents of the Nuzhah were shaped by the sorry state of affairs during that period.
iii. Ibn Ḥajar’s section on travelling in pursuit of ḥadīth (5.69) is admittedly short. But it is still indicative enough to criticise those who sought ‘excessive shaykhs’ rather than ‘excessive reports’. Again, it suggests that the Mamluk period was one where ḥadīth studies was in demand for the wrong reasons. Ibn Ṭūlūn (d. 953/1546) acknowledged this when he commented:

The young and old, the poor and rich, and the ignorant and the learned all participate in it… [though] the study of ḥadīth [had become] something other than ḥadīth (Dickinson 2002, 489).

Rather than the disciple travelling to seek the shaykh, the shaykh would sometimes travel extensively to seek the largest and most-lucrative crowds (Dickinson 2002, 495). Again, it shows how ḥadīth had become a sport in the later medieval ages.

iv. Near the end of the Nuzhah, a section is included which outlines the required etiquettes of the shaykh and disciple (5.66). Undoubtedly, this advice was tendered from the very early beginnings of ḥadīth reporting and collection and so in this respect, Ibn Ḥajar continued this important teaching. But the exact nature of the advice given in the Nuzhah suggests that he was criticising his contemporaries who had lost the religious value attached to ḥadīth. As it was mentioned in section 5.66, Mālik attached great importance to his gatherings and ensured he and his audience were fully aware in the importance of the subject material. Acts like applying perfume and performing ritual ablution before ḥadīth reporting was standard practice back then. By Ibn al-Kathīr’s (d. 774/1373) time, the gatherings were occupied by Muslims falling asleep and talking to one another (Dickinson 2002, 498). Based on the fact that Ibn Ḥajar in the Nuzhah reminds readers to ‘sit with dignity’ and ‘not to report whilst standing’ or ‘in the streets’, it would be accurate to say that standards had declined drastically by his era.

This was the case with the students of ḥadīth and in some cases, the state of the teacher was no better. Ibn Ḥajar’s student al-Sakhawī complained of inept readings from uncollated texts stemming from incompetent teachers during his time. But he also adds that it was tolerated in order to perpetuate the custom of the using the isnād (Dickinson 2002, 501).

v. The section on ‘knowing the method of writing and recording’ (5.68) could be interpreted as an appeal to the masses to pay due attention to the ḥadīth circles. In this part, he asks readers to avoid distractions like ‘copying, talking and tiredness’. In earlier times, Muslims went to ḥadīth gatherings to learn. It seems that by the ninth Islamic century, Muslims went to be seen. Ibn Ḥajar’s advice in the Nuzhah attempted to correct this feature.

vi. The section on i’tibār (5.13) too can be viewed as reflective of Ibn Ḥajar’s time. Here was an appeal to engage in finding corroborations for existing reports and to actively engage in cross-checking different reports. This, for Ibn Ḥajar, was the real purpose of ḥadīth studies in the ninth Islamic century. It was not a social pastime that attracted the ignorant and short-sighted.

To conclude, the pursuit of elevation during the era of Ibn Ḥajar had resulted in some damning repercussions on the discipline. Undoubtedly, this was not specific to his time, but it had become an unhealthy obsession for many centuries prior to him. The justification for it was sought on religious and spiritual grounds since there was no means by which it could be justified academically. Al-Sakhāwī voiced this sentiment when he said that ‘those who acquire an elevated isnād as children hope in their old age to belong to a generation better than the one they are in or the one after it and following it’ (Dickinson 2002, 504).

2. Forgery and weak reports were still a problem during that period. This is due to the fact that a large proportion of his work was dedicated to the rejected traditions and the reasons behind them. The added emphasis and clarification from Ibn Ḥajar on this area suggests that the public still did not fully understand what constituted a rejected report and why they could not be used for evidence. In al-Durar, Ibn Ḥajar includes the entry of Waḍḍāḥ who in 753, claimed that he was a Prophet (Perho 2011, 33). This shows that in the eight and ninth century, there was a degree of religious turbulence and indeed ignorance. One of the tricks of such imposters was to justify their claims through prophetic traditions. An example was the forged report:

I am the last Prophet. There is no Prophet after me. Unless Allah wills.

Within the section on the rejected in the Nuzhah, extensive emphasis is given to bid’a. Ibn Ḥajar’s feeling on bid’a is one of tolerance and leniency. He suggests that in spite of sectarian differences, Muslims should collectively take transmissions from one another for the sake of a common goal, namely the protection of ḥadīth literature. In a similar style, the presence of different sectarian groups during his time may have been encouraged to put aside their differences for the sake of a common goal, a harmonious society. Ibn Ḥajar displayed this attitude of tolerance himself; he took knowledge from the Zāhirīs (literalists) (al-Barrī et al. 1995, 87).

After the documentation of ḥadīths centuries earlier, is it possible that forgeries still presented a problem and a matter for grave concern for the likes of Ibn Ḥajar? In my mind, absolutely. In fact, it is still a major problem for Muslims within themselves in this day and age. Different denominations refute and counter-refute the beliefs of their counterparts by frequently deeming reports as forgeries. A good example of this is the practice of kissing the thumbs and placing them on the eyes upon hearing Muḥammad’s name, based on a ḥadīth which reports that ʿAbdū Bakr did this in the presence of the Prophet. The ḥadīth does have some authenticity to it, as declared by al-Sakhāwī in al-Maqāṣid al-ḥasanah. But because it is a practice which today has become a means of differentiating the Sufi Muslims from their Wahhabi counterparts, the latter have declared the report has a blatant forgery (Zaheer 2011, pp. 140-1).

3. Particularly in the early parts of the Nuzhah, there was a marked absence of fiqh-related matters. Three possible reasons behind this were outlined in the section on mursal (5.19). Of these reasons, it is possible that Ibn Ḥajar’s own personal experience in fiqh-related matters was the main catalyst behind its absence in the Nuzhah. In short, fiqh became a source of embarrassment for Ibn Ḥajar. The manner in which he was recruited for judicial positions only then to be ousted was disruptive at even comical. At the very least, there was no continuity whatsoever. The Encyclopaedia of Islam informs us that:
A judgeship, which he did not accept, was offered to him in the Yemen in his early years. Reluctantly, he had been holding an associate judgeship in conjunction with Jalāl al-Dīn al-Bulqīnī when his great opportunity came on 27 Muharram 827. He was dismissed for the first time less than eleven months later, but the office of Chief Judge of Egypt (and Syria) remained his for a combined total of about twenty-one years. He was reinstated on 2 Rajab 828; dismissed on 26 Ṣafar 833, and reinstated on 26 Jamāda I 834; dismissed on 5 Shawwāl 840, and reinstated on 6 Shawwāl 841; dismissed in Muharram 844, and reinstated on 26 Safar 844; dismissed on 15 Dhū al-Qa‘da 846 and reinstated after two days (followed by another even briefer period out of office in Rabī‘ I 848); dismissed on 11 Muharram 849 (after the collapse of a minaret with much loss of life, when attempts were made to hold the office of the Chief Judge responsible for the safety of the structure), and reinstated on 5 Ṣa‘īd 850; dismissed in Dhū al-Ḥajja 850, and reinstated on 8 Rabi‘ II 852. He lost the office finally on 25 Jamāda II 852. A few months later… he died. (vol. III, 777)

This experience contrasts widely with the discipline of ḥadīth. Beginning with al-Shaykhāniyya in 808/1405 until Zayniyyah in 851/1447, Ibn Ḥajar had a trouble-free time in teaching ḥadīth. At the ṣūfī lodges (khanqah) of Baybars in Cairo, he taught ḥadīth for over twenty years. His most prized work was Fath al-bārī, a product of teaching ḥadīth. This brought him unparalleled fame and fortune, even before he had completed it. The kings and dignitaries of the time requested his Fath al-bārī for their scholars to learn and teach. It is said that it was then sold for three hundred dinārs. When it was finally finished in 842/1438, a great celebration was held in Cairo, in the presence of leading Cairean dignitaries, scholars and judges (al-Wajīdi 1996, 15).

Thus this love for ḥadīth and distrust of the judiciary (and not necessarily fiqh per se, as he did write many books on fiqh-related topics) may have seriously affected the contents of the Nuzhah and shaped its final form. This theory has weight when we observe the lengthy praise he directs to al-Bukhārī and his Ṣahīḥ in the Nuzhah.

4. There are other instances where Ibn Ḥajar as a person influenced the Nuzhah. The above point regarding the judiciary centres more on his experiences. Upon analysing his personality, character and outlook, there are indications that these traits found themselves way into the Nuzhah.

To a considerable extent, Ibn Ḥajar was a man of good traits. In al-Nujum al-Zāhira, al-Atabākī described him with words such as ‘dignity, radiance and deliberation’. He added that:

He rarely spoke to a person in a manner that would be disliked by him. In fact he would behave well and forgive the one who was evil towards him (1992, 15: 259).

His student al-Sakhāwī noted his excellent manners and his veneration of the elderly (2: 39). The Nuzhah too has won admirers for displaying similar traits. It is largely non-confrontational and not provocative. When he disagrees with an opinion, he refutes it mildly and with respect. In fact, there are places where he mentions the actual criticism minus the person who advocated it. In this respect, it did differ from earlier works of the same genre. Dickinson writes:

Almost all of the works in the genre of uṣūl al-ḥadīth begin with condemnations of the sorry state into which ḥadīth scholarship had fallen. The Mugaddima [of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ] does too… (2002, 485).

Rightly so, Dickinson also points to al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī’s al-Kifāya as an example of a treatise bemoaning the moral outrage of his time in ḥadīth affairs (2002, 485). There is no indication of such condemnation in the Nuzhah. In fact, his work commences with praise of the efforts his predecessors exerted in the discipline.

5. Related to the above point is the political climate he resided in. Undoubtedly, it was a turbulent time, when a scholar’s success depended on his proximity to the state. His character was key in overcoming these hurdles and focussing on religious matters as much as possible.
7.0. Conclusion.

At the beginning of this thesis, I set out to provide an accessible and accurate translation of the Nuzhah, coupled with a critical commentary. The translation, I believe, is an accurate rendition of the original Arabic. The benefit and result of the commentary has been outlined clearly in the previous chapter. The themes that I referred to there – matn criticism, the technical terms, seniority, between stagnation and development, the convergence and divergence of Muslim and non-Muslim thought, the pedagogical nature of the Nuzhah and the climate of the ninth Islamic century – could only have been unearthed by mostly reading between the lines of the Nuzhah. They were all intricate and hidden points that needed close attention and analysis. With confidence I can say that this is what differentiates my commentary from the many produced by Muslim scholars on the Nuzhah. The likes of Almadaq, Al-Munawwī, Mīghālī, al-Qārī, al-‘Uthaymin and al-Wajīdī all wrote highly-coveted works specifically on the Nuzhah. None really questioned the material in front of them but merely set about directing undiluted praise at the work. I too agree that it is a brilliant piece of work. But reading between the lines and setting the work within its climate tells us show much more about Ibn Ḥajar, the field of ‘ilm al-hadīth and why the work has stood the test of time academically. In comparison to non-Muslim works on ‘ilm al-hadīth, again I believe my work shows a fresh outlook and originality. This is because this work has analysed ‘ilm al-hadīth in a holistic manner that covers all aspects of it, not just on a particular area like the forged reports or rijāl literature.
I will admit that in many parts of the main section, I have been overtly critical of the Nuzhah. In many of these places, Ibn Ḥajar is not at fault. He merely outlined a discipline that he inherited from his ancestors. If seeking elevation distracted Muslims from the real purpose of ḥadīth in his time, then this was also a problem in centuries before him. The respect for senior figures in ḥadīth studies (and then the subsequent acceptance of their findings without question) had existed from the early period of ḥadīth collection. If Ibn Ḥajar openly praised the brilliance of al-Bukhārī, then so did al-‘Iyād, Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ and al-Ḥākim before him.

In spite of these shortcomings and criticisms, the Nuzhah does offer a brilliant, holistic account of the discipline. We know that the Nuzhah is not a true reflection of Ibn Ḥajar’s knowledge of ḥadīth; he wrote separate treatises on countless areas of the discipline which are only mentioned briefly in the Nuzhah. But he showed great skill as a writer to condense his vast expertise and authority in the field into one, accessible and relatively-brief book, which is perfect – to this very day – as an introduction to ʿilm al-ḥadīth. Most observers will agree that it is easier to expand, harder to shorten and summarise. On this basis alone, Ibn Ḥajar deserves praise for providing such a clear guide to the discipline in a short work. Deliberately, I presented three diagrams that (i) summarised how the reports reached us (section 5.8.2.) (ii) summarised the maqṭūl reports (5.16.3) (iii) summarised the rejected traditions (5.38.2). The purpose was to show how simple the Nuzhah is. Over 70% of the book can be easily condensed into three brief and clear diagrams. This is a sign of good authorship (especially for a book that is five hundred years old) and indicates why from London to Lahore, the Nuzhah is still in demand in Muslim seminaries. Perhaps this is the primary reason why Ibn Ḥajar himself was proud of the Nuzhah. He wrote hundreds of books during his lifetime, but according to his disciple al-Sakhāwī, he only showed pride towards a handful; Sharḥ Ṣahīḥ al-Bukhārī, its introduction al-Mushtabiḥ, Tahdhib al-tahdhib, Līsān al-mīzān and the Nuzhah (al-Munāwī 1999, 1: 27).

The tone of the Nuzhah too is worthy of mention too. It is straight-forward and un-confrontational. His criticism of the field in general or certain individuals is rare. In this sense, it has some similarities with the Mā Lā Yasa‘u of al-Mayyānishī (d. 581/1185), which Librande says presents ‘no controversy or variant or opposing points of view for his readers’ (1982, 39). Primarily, I think this has come about because of his character and good personality, which then trickled itself into his works.

Every work, even if it is to the smallest extent, is a product of its time and place. This thesis itself would have been different in contents had it been written three hundred years ago or in modern-day Cairo. The same can be said of the Nuzhah too. Undoubtedly, he did live in a politically turbulent time. But Ibn Ḥajar’s outlook and character was pivotal in dealing with the state in a largely fruitful manner and more importantly for our purpose, allowing little of this to affect his writings in the Nuzhah. We learn a substantial amount about the era in which the Nuzhah was produced, socially and certainly academically and less so about the political climate from the Nuzhah alone. Perhaps a work like al-Durar would have been more useful for this purpose.
Personally, the thesis has been a great learning curve. In particular, I have appreciated that good authorship requires a person to ‘step-back’ from his own actuality in order to produce a fair and impartial piece of work. Many Muslim scholars have showed great scepticism towards the non-Muslim literature on ḥadīth, because it is quite critical. This is understandable. A Muslim believes wholeheartedly in the truth of Muḥammad and the religion he bequeathed. This certainly affects his/her academic judgement as it becomes difficult to hear anything that in any way lessens his God-given stature.

I have tried to overcome these hurdles and work as a researcher first and foremost. And I truly believe that Muslims can benefit immensely from non-Muslim interest in ḥadīth. This thesis has gone a long way in persuading me that knowledge is important, produced from Muslims and non-Muslims equally.

At the moment, Muslims to a large extent find this a hard pill to swallow. Many Muslim scholars argue that the western academics’ only intention is to belittle Islam, not study it. But the Muslim academics only want to refute the western works on Islam, and not appreciate and digest it. In short, if a case is to be made for the importance of Orientalism in the study of ḵilm al-ḥadīth, then the presence of Occidentalism must also be accepted.

If the western academics are guilty of using derogative language against the Muslims, so are the Muslims. Siddiqi writes that Goldziher’s thesis on early ḥadīth was ‘in many ways a characteristic product of his troubled and instinctively polemic mind’ (1993, 125). This view itself is difficult to prove and it seems that Siddiqi misunderstood the text.291 If

291 The assertion from Siddiqi is that Ignaz Goldziher ‘privately acknowledged the superiority of Islam’ while remaining a synagogue official. I contacted Professor Gordon Campbell (International Office, the Azami is to be wholly believed, then Schacht ‘misunderstands the text he quotes’ (1996, 3), he ‘quotes out of context’ (ibid.) and is guilty of ‘frequent methodological errors’ (1996, 17). The name of his book (On Schacht’s Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence) suggests his intention is only to rebuke him.

Non-Muslims too can learn. By observing the Nuzhah’s coverage, it can also be deduced that Muslim ḥadīth masters accepted their own fallibility and that of early transmitters. Nowhere do we find a suggestion of perfection. Quite the contrary, the Nuzhah extensively refers to reports that have some form of imperfection in them, and how they can be identified. There are twenty categories of the rejected. We are informed of how reports were either mis-spelt or misread. Ibn Ḥajar devotes a large part of his work explaining how to avoid confusion over the names of different reporters. This shows that Muslim ḥadīth masters were critical of the discipline centuries before the appearance of serious western interest. And this point also thus amplifies the need for a work like the Nuzhah to be taken seriously by western scholars.

Here it is in English:
‘In those weeks, I truly entered into the spirit of Islam to such an extent that ultimately I became inwardly convinced that I myself was a Muslim, and judiciously discovered that this was the only religion which, even in its doctrinal and official formulation, can satisfy philosophic minds. My ideal was to elevate Judaism to a similar rational level. Islam, as my experience taught me, is the only religion, in which superstitious and heathen ingredients are not frowned upon by rationalism, but by orthodox doctrine.’
This is a complex position, but I think that he is saying that Judaism could be enriched by drawing on the insights of Islam; Siddiqi's suggestion of hypocrisy is misplaced.'
My final word is on Ibn Ḥajar and his Nuzhah. At the beginning of the thesis, I explained how Nuzhat al-nazar was an expansion on another work of his, Nukhbat al-fikar fi muṣṭalāḥ al-athar. In my mind, the relationship between the Nuzhah and the Nukhbah captures what the discipline went through as a whole. In the same manner the Nuzhah simply added detail to the Nukhbah, the later scholars merely added detail to the work of the earlier ones. Ibn Ḥajar marked the terminal end to this process, as his ‘life work constitutes the final summation of the sciences of ḥadīth’ 292 And on this point, it is only befitting we remind Muslims of one of the titles associated with Ibn Ḥajar, Khātam al-ḥuffāz (the seal of the ḥadīth masters). This title is a great compliment to Ibn Ḥajar because it reflects his expertise in ḥadīth. But for subsequent Muslims, the title is anything but complimentary. This is because it suggests that after Ibn Ḥajar, the discipline of ‘ilm al-ḥadīth resigned itself to apathy and passiveness.

\(^{293}\) This is perhaps the magnum opus of his literary works, a detailed commentary on the Ṣaḥīḥ of Imām al-Bukhārī. He began this project in 817/1414, as he taught the Ṣaḥīḥ to his Ḥadīth students in Cairo. His disciples would record his dictations and soon the works took on the form of a book. Fifteen years after he began this work, the Mamluk Sultan al-Ashraf Barsbay requested a copy of the works, and the first three volumes were duly sent to him by Ibn Hajar. When it was finished in 842/1438, a great celebration was held in Cairo, in the presence of leading Cairene dignitaries (al-Wajīdī 1996, 15).

Al-Munāwī – in addition to the aforementioned works – has also ascribed the following to Ibn Ḥajar (1999, 1: pp. 123-46);

134. Tabayyun al-‘ajab fīmā warada fī ṣiyām Rajab.
137. Al-‘Ilām bi-man summiya Muḥammad qabl al-Islām.
